No opposition or ill treatment should deter the man of God from declaring his whole message: and indeed many have maintained their boldness and faithfulness in their public work, under the most perilous circumstances; who yet have been grievously baffled by Satan's temptations in their private experience, and led to wish they had never engaged in it, or that they could change their employment for some other. But they who put their hands to the plough, and look back, are not fit for the kingdom of God: and after all, the minister's work is in reality the most important, honourable, and useful service, that man can possibly perform. But they who are thus employed deceive themselves, if they expect worldly honour, and the friendship of men, from a faithful discharge of their office: nay, if they do not expect contempt, opposition, and injurious treatment, from the ungodly of every description. The Lord doth indeed allure men into the service, by giving them a hope of usefulness, and assurance of assistance and support: and few are at first aware of the extent and variety of those trials and difficulties, to which they will be exposed in the course of their ministry. So that when contempt, derision, or hard usage, tempt them to resolve that they will speak no more in his name, or that they will qualify their message, and render it more palatable, the Lord, being stronger than they, will prevail, and they will find "his word like a burning fire shut up in their bones," and that no relief from their disquietude can be had, but by faithfully declaring the whole counsel of God. Thus "necessity is laid upon them, yea, wo unto them, "if they do not preach the Gospel." Indeed, were we only to speak of promises and privileges, and indiscriminately to deal out consolation, all would go on very smoothly: but if we are faithful, we must cry aloud, and not spare either ourselves or the people, either professed believers or opposers; we must reprove men's sins, and denounce the wrath of God against every one that doth evil. Thus our earnestness alone will excite the derision and mockery of the profane; our faithful rebukes and warnings will exasperate the Pharisee and hypocrite. None will make any allowance for him, who will grant no indulgence to any man's sins: all around will watch for the halting of the bold reprove, and report with additions whatever they spy of imperfection in his conduct. Even the harmlessness of the dove, and the wisdom of the serpent, could not exempt him from defamation from those who want to be revenged on him, for the terrors of conscience which he has occasioned them. But God will be with and for his servants: he sees the uprightness of their hearts, and approves their conduct: let them then open their cause before him, and he will enable them to foresee the ruin of their implacable enemies, and their own complete

V. 9. If the king and his princes refused to surrender, the people were called on to provide for their own safety; which could only be done by going over to the Chaldeans. As this was the express command of God, it fully released them from all obligation to obey their rulers, who acted in avowed defiance of him.

For a prey. As a thing recovered from extreme danger. Or, 'instead of spoil.' He ought to think of himself a considerable gainer, by escaping with his life, in so general a destruction. (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. Some expositors suppose that a new prophecy is here begun, which was delivered long before the rest of the chapter. But there is not the smallest intimation given of this: and it was proper, even to the last, that exhortations to repentance and works meet for repentance should be given along with denunciations of wrath. The justice of God in punishing the obstinate rebels, who refused to hearken, would be thus more fully illustrated. And, though the destruction of the city, and the captivity of the nation, were absolutely determined; yet a variety of circumstances might exceedingly have mitigated the horrors of that catastrophe, especially to Zedekiah and his sons, had this exhortation been regarded. (xxxviii. 17—23. xxxix. 6, 7.) The wickedness of Zedekiah and his sons, and that of the princes of that line, was aggravated by their relation to David. They probably trusted in the covenant of royalty, whilst their crimes forfeited their personal interest in it: and the exhortation implied a severe reproof of Zedekiah's conduct, as guilty of abuse of power and neglect of duty. But let him and his princes immediately and earnestly set themselves to execute justice, and deliver the oppressed: let them do it "in the morning," as their first concern, at that time when their courts were held, and every morning: or else the Lord's anger would burn unquenchably against them.

V. 13, 14. Jerusalem was builded part on a hill, and part in the valley, and was compassed about with mountains. (Note, xvii. 3.)—They confided in the strength of the place, as the Jebusites had formerly done. (Louth.) Indeed the city was thought impregnable, and therefore the inhabitants flattered themselves that they should escape; for none would be able to enter their walls, though the adjacent countries should be wasted. But the Lord declared that he was against them, and would destroy them. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most obstinate sinners, yea, the most virulent persecutors, have seasons of compunction, and are sometimes convinced that their faithful reprovers are wiser and happier than they. So that, in seasons of urgent distress and peril, men frequently desire the counsels and prayers of the very persons, whom at other times they despise or oppose: and thus the servants of God pass "through honour and dishonour, through evil and good report." But such men only inquire after deliverance from punishment: if the Lord would deal with them according to the riches of his power and mercy, in saving them from suffering, and then leave them to indulge themselves in sin, they would be reconciled to him and to his ministers; and they will meet with teachers, who will encourage them upon this plan, for a valuable consideration to themselves. But the faithful servant of God is zealous for his Master's honour, and adheres to his instructions: he can encourage no man who refuses to repent and to do works meet for repentance: he will stand to it, that they who hate the precepts have no interest in the promises of God; and that he will never deal with hypocrites according to the wonders which he performs for his people. When they who stand out in obstinate disobedience would presume on external privileges, let them be told, that God will prosper his open enemies against them; nay, that he will battle all their efforts, and fight against them by his own out-stretched arm, and not spare them, or show them any favour. Yet intimations of mercy are couched under the severest denunciations: and in the most tremendous public calamities, there is hope for individuals of escaping the wrath to come. No sinner on earth is absolutely left without refuge, who desires to avail himself of one: life and death are continually set before men; but the way of life is humiliating, it requires self-denial and singularity, and exposes men to difficulty and reproach. Few therefore choose it: but most persist in that course against which the most awful vengeance of God is denounced. In all possible circumstances, the way of duty is the safest and most advantageous; and will tend to alleviate those miseries which cannot be entirely avoided. When sinners therefore inquire about events, they should be directed to the duties of their stations: they, who are descended from pious ancestors, should be exhorted to imitate them; and they who are placed in authority, should be reminded to execute justice and do good: otherwise such distinctions will the more expose men, when "the fury of the Lord goeth forth like fire, and burneth, that none can quench it because of the evil of their doings." He sets himself especially against those who presumptuously defy his threatenings: and he will let them know, that none of their carnal confidences can withstand the power of his righteous indignation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. Some interpreters suppose that this chapter contains two distinct messages, the one sent to Jehoiakim, and the other afterwards to Jeconiah or Jehoiachin his son: but there is in it no intimation of this. Others suppose, that the whole chapter was addressed to Jeconiah: and that the former part was a recapitulation of messages formerly delivered to Jehoiakim: but there is great difficulty in applying the conclusion of the address to Jeconiah. It hath therefore been supposed by a few interpreters, that the whole was addressed to Zedekiah, and that it is a continuation of the subject of the preceding chapter. This interpretation I accede to: but without being very confident in so doubtful a matter. If this point could be ascertained, the difficulties would vanish, which upon other interpretations are almost, if not quite, insuperable; as will be shown: but there is no evidence on either side, except the chapter itself compared with the context; of which the reader will judge for himself. Yet it seems very reasonable to expect, that after Jeremiah had answered Zedekiah's inquiries by his messengers, the Lord should send him in person to confirm and enforce his word in the manner here recorded: and the abrupt opening of the chapter, as well as its coincidence with the preceding, favours this opinion. We suppose then, that Zedekiah is addressed; and that the names of the other kings are introduced, by way of reminding him that the predictions concerning them, which they had disregarded, had been exactly accomplished; and from this to infer, that those which related to him and the approaching captivity would be so likewise. Coniah indeed is last mentioned in the chapter, and Zedekiah is not named in it; but he had been mentioned in the former part of the subject, as the foregoing chapter is supposed to have been: and being here addressed in person as king of Judah, it was not necessary to address him by name.

V. 2—5. (Marg. Ref.) * This was his ordinary manner of preaching before kings, from Josiah to Zedekiah, which was about forty years.* The prophet repeats to Zedekiah the admonitions which he had given to his predecessors, connected with similar promises and denunciations: and the express declarations made in other places, that the city would be taken and destroyed, implied that God certainly foreknew Zedekiah's obstinate disobedience. Thus the Lord again and again sent Moses to Pharaoh, to demand the liberty of Israel, though he knew and foretold that Pharaoh would not let them go till forced to it. (Note, xxi. 11, 12.)

V. 6. The palace of the kings of Judah was become very magnificent; it had been favoured more than the residence of other kings, and made pre-eminent by its vicinity to the temple; and the royal family had been equally favoured and exalted by the covenant with David and his seed: but having been polluted with idolatry and iniquity, they were condemned to be destroyed and made desolate. Gilead was renowned for rich pastures, and Lebanon for stately cedars. (Marg. Ref.)

against thee, every one with his weapons: and they shall cut down thy choice cedars, and cast them into the fire.

3 And many nations shall pass by this city, and they shall say every man to his neighbour, Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this great city?

9 Then they shall answer, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD their God, and worshipped other gods, and served them.

10 Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him: but weep sore for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more, nor see his native country.

11 For thus saith the LORD touching Shallum the son of Josiah king of Judah, which reigned instead of Josiah his father, which went forth out of this place; He shall not return thither any more:

12 But he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this land no more.

13 Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; that useth his neighbour's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work;

14 That saith, I will build me a wide house, and large chambers, and cutteth him out windows: and it is ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion.

15 Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar! did not thy father eat and drink, and do judgment and justice, and then it was well with him?

16 He judged the cause of the poor and needy; then it was well with him: was not this to know me! saith the LORD.

17 But thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression, and for violence, to do it.

18 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah; They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah my brother! or, Ah sister! they shall not lament for him, saying, Ah lord! or, Ah his glory!

19 He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.

V. 10—12. The ruin of the kingdom of Judah commenced by the death of Josiah: the prophet therefore recurred to that event, and referred to predictions that were delivered soon after, when Jehoahaz, or Shallum, had been carried away captive into Egypt by Pharaoh-necho, the people had great cause to mourn their own loss in Josiah's death; and for their sins, which had provoked the Lord to remove him; yet they needed not bemoan him, as if he had suffered loss by being taken away from the evil to come, for he died in reputation, and at peace with God. But they had a more recent cause for sorrow in the captivity of Shallum, who was doomed, for his early wickedness, to live and die a captive in Egypt, and never more to return to his own land. The people, it seems, did not believe this prediction at the time when it was uttered: but it had been exactly verified. And this very properly came in to confirm the predictions that were afterwards delivered, and which were treated with similar disregard. We must adopt this interpretation, whether we suppose Jeconiah or Zedekiah to be addressed. 'I shall lay it down as most probable that Shallum, mentioned in the text, is the same as Jehoahaz: for the characters here set down can agree with no other. It was he that reigned instead of his father Josiah. He likewise was carried captive, and never returned.' (Lowth.)—Some indeed think the Shallum mentioned in Chronicles cannot be the same; because they conclude from the historian's language that he was younger than Zedekiah; but Jehoahaz was older than he. (Note, 1 Chr. iii. 15.)

V. 13—19. These verses evidently relate to Jehoiakim, who succeeded his younger brother Jehoahaz, or Shallum; but whether they were, on this occasion, addressed to him, or whether they were adduced in confirmation of other predictions, is not agreed. According to the interpretation here adopted the case of Jehoiakim was recurred to, to convince Zedekiah that the prediction uttered against him and Jerusalem would certainly be accomplished. Jehoiakim it seems built a magnificent palace in those calamitous times, the expense of which exceeded his finances: and this introduced a system of iniquity and oppression. He constrained his subjects to work without wages, and never paid for the materials; and in various ways he committed extortion and injustice. 'A crying sin, and too common among the great men of the world.' (Lowth.) But did he think that his house of cedar would secure his authority, or prolong his reign? His pious father affected not such splendour; but he lived in plenty and hospitality, with out injuring any of his subjects: and his clear conscience and character, the love of his people, and above all the favour of God, were far preferable to Jehoiakim's guilty and

 and lift up thy voice in Bashan, and cry from the passages : ° for all thy lovers are destroyed.

21 I ° spake unto thee in thy * prosperity ; but thou saidst, I will not hear.
 ° This hath been thy manner from thy youth, that thou obeyedst not my voice.

22 The ° wind shall eat up all ° thy pastors, and ° thy lovers shall go into captivity : ° surely then shalt thou be ashamed, and confounded for all thy wickedness.

23 O † inhabitant of ° Lebanon, that ° makest thy nest in the cedars, ° how gracious shalt thou be when pangs come upon thee, the pain as of a woman in travail !

24 As I live, saith the LORD, though ° Coniah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah were ° the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee hence ;

25 And ° I will give thee into the hand of them that seek thy life, and into the hand of them whose face thou fearest, even into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of the Chaldeans.

26 And ° I will cast thee out, and thy mother that bare thee, into another country, where ye were not born ; and there shalt ye die.

27 But ° to the land whereunto they † desire to return, thither shall they not return.

28 ¶ Is this man ° Coniah ° a despised broken idol ? is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure ? wherefore are they cast out, ° he and his seed, and are cast into a land
 ° which they know not ?

29 O ° earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the LORD.

30 Thus saith the LORD, ° Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days : for no man of his odious magnificence. Moreover Josiah was the patron of the poor, and his throne was established in righteousness : and his obedience to God, and imitation of his justice, truth, and goodness, in the exercise of his authority, proved that he knew and loved him. But Jehoiakim was continually looking out for opportunities of gratifying his abominable avarice ; in pursuit of iniquitous gain, he committed murder and every kind of oppression ; and thus he became odious to his subjects : so that it was predicted, that when he should be prematurely cut off, his relations would not grieve for him as a brother, nor his people as a ruler, nor would any lament that his glory was turned into ignominy : and after his death his body would be treated with the utmost contempt, and buried with the burial of an ass ; which creatures, when they died in the city, would be dragged forth to some place without the gates, where rubbish was thrown, there to be devoured by dogs, or to rot in the ground. We read that Jehoiakim was taken prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar, and bound in fetters, to be carried to Babylon ; (2 Chr. xxxvi. 6. Ez. xix. 9.) and Josephus relates that he was slain, and his body left unburied. But as the gates of Jerusalem seem to relate to the burial of the ass, and not that of Jehoiakim, it matters not to inquire whether this took place near Jerusalem, or at Babylon. Doubtless the exact fulfilment of the prediction was well known at Jerusalem : and the event might therefore very properly be adduced, in confirmation of the prophet's other warnings to the king and people of Judah.

V. 20-23. These verses seem to relate to the nation at large, and may be considered as the prophet's address to them on the success of the Chaldeans, and their dis- appointment of assistance from Egypt. They might now betake themselves to Lebanon or Bashan, or the other entrances into the land, to lament their miseries, and cry for help : but none would regard them ; for all their idols and idolatrous allies were about to be destroyed by the power of the conqueror. The Lord had warned them of these calamities in their more prosperous days, and com- manded them to repent of their sins ; but they were aroused and obstinate in rebellion : and this had been the manner of the nation from the beginning, that they would not obey his voice. Therefore all their rulers and teachers would perish, as the fruits of the earth are blighted by an un- wholesome wind ; and their allies will go with them into captivity, being reduced by the same power. They thought themselves indeed as safe in Jerusalem, as the eagle in her nest, on the top of a cedar upon the summits of Lebanon ; and therefore they despised the word of God : but destruction was coming as pangs on a woman in travail ; and then they would show some regard to the Lord, and assume the appearance of humility, devotion, or of mercy to their oppressed brethren ; but it would not prevent their ruin.

V. 24-27. After the removal of Jehoiakim, Jeconiah reigned for a short time, and was then taken prisoner and carried to Babylon ; where he continued many years before his death. He is here called Coniah, in contempt, as it is generally thought : the first syllable of his name, being a part of the name of JEHOVAH, is cut off, perhaps as an intimation that the Lord no longer owned him. As he was the lineal heir of the house of David, it might have been thought that God would have taken special care of him : but he swore by himself, that even were Coniah to him like the royal signet on the right hand of a king, his ornament and a peculiar badge of authority, he would pluck him off, and cast him away with disdain ; and that he should end his days in captivity, with his mother, who had brought him up in iniquity, and with the rest of his family. V. 23—30. This is the application of the whole address, which is here supposed to have been made to Zedekiah. Indeed Jeconiah is spoken of as absent, and as already in captivity. Now, had he been thrown aside as a broken idol, or a vessel which a man cares not to make use of? Wherefore was he and his seed carried captive to Babylon? Was it not for their sins? And did Zedekiah, who copied and far exceeded them, expect to prosper on the throne of David? If he would pay no regard to the word of God, let the earth itself hear and record it: for the Lord had determined, that this man, (to whom the prophet addressed himself,) should die childless, and be unsuccessful all his days; and that none of his seed should prosper, filling the throne of David, and ruling over Judah; as he had vainly expected, after his nephew Jeconiah was carried captive. If we understand this of Zedekiah, all is very easy: he was taken prisoner by Nebuchadrezzar, his sons were slain before his eyes, then his eyes were put out, he was carried to Babylon, and we read no more of him or his posterity. But if we apply it to Jeconiah, we are involved in difficulties. He certainly left several sons: (Marg. Ref.) Zerubbabel his grandson possessed great authority, and prospered ruling in Judah. Jeconiah's name stands in the genealogy of our Lord, as one of the line of David, from whom Joseph the husband of Mary was descended. Nay, Jeconiah himself may be said to have prospered towards the close of his days. (2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) So that this sentence seems not to have been executed, respecting him, in any measure answerable to the peculiar solemnity with which it was denounced. To obviate these difficulties, some conjecture that Salathiel, the father of Zerubbabel, was only the adopted son of Jeconiah: but it is expressly said, that "he begat him," which can hardly mean less than that he was his ancestor: (Matt. i. 12. Note, i Chr. iii. 17.) and such an interpretation would reduce the genealogy of Christ, and indeed all other genealogies, to uncertainty. Others suppose, that the sentence only meant that he should not see any comfort in his children, and that they should not succeed him on the throne; but that, after the death of Zedekiah, the temporal kingdom of David should terminate: but the word rendered childless occurs only in two other places; and both seem to confirm our translation of it. (Gen. xv. 2. Lev. xx. 21.) And certainly Zerubbabel ruled prosperously in Judah, though he did not sit on the throne of David. As to the opinion, that the Salathiel and Zorobabel, in the line of Nathan, must be the same as the Salathiel and Zerubbabel in the line of Solomon; though neither their ancestors nor their descendants were the same;

nothing, but the countenance and sanction of so many learned men, could entitle it to any degree of attention.—For the coincidence of names in the same nation and the same family is so very common in all history, that one cannot but wonder to see so much built upon it in this instance. But having suggested what appears to me the most obvious method of removing the difficulty, I shall only add, that there seems a peculiar propriety in the prophet's thus adducing former instances of the Lord's performing his predictions, as an introduction to passing this solemn sentence of condemnation on him, under whose government, and through whose obstinacy, Jerusalem was destroyed, and the people carried into captivity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The mightiest princes are as much concerned to hear the word of God, as their meanest subjects; and they who are called to speak to them, in the name of God, should deal plainly and faithfully with them: as their servants and people are deeply concerned in their conduct, and are generally influenced by it. No durable prosperity in any station can be obtained without obedience to God's commandments. Nor can real religion subsist, without justice, truth, and mercy, in our relative conduct. They who are intrusted with authority, are under the greatest obligations to imitate our God, in patronizing the poor and rescuing the oppressed: and innocent blood shed by them, under colour of law, or by iniquitous wars, must be as exactly accounted for, as that which their inferiors shed in violation of their statutes. The neglect of these things exposes nations to the righteous vengeance of God: and he alike disregards temples and palaces, when they who frequent or possess them will not obey his word. He neither destroys cities, nations, nor individuals, except for their sins; and in this world he often makes it obvious to every one, for what crimes he inflicts punishment: but this will be fully manifest to all the world, at "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." They who have escaped from this world of sin and sorrow, and are safely arrived at the mansions of the blest, may more reasonably be envied than lamented: and their happiness should reconcile survivors to the loss they have sustained. But impenitent sinners, living or dying, are objects of our compassion or lamentation. Speedily death will remove the most prosperous from their good things here, and their place will know them no more; and they have a place of torment prepared for them in the eternal world. 13 And I have seen * folly in the prophets of Samaria; they prophesied in Baal, and caused my people Israel to err.

14 I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem † an horrible thing: † they commit adultery, and walk in lies: they strengthen also the hands of evil-doers, that none doth return from their wickedness: they are all of them unto me † as Sodom, and the inhabitants thereof as Gomorrah.

15 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts concerning the prophets; Behold, I will feed them with wormwood, and make them drink the water of gall: for from the prophets of Jerusalem is ‡ profaneness gone forth into all the land.

16 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, † Hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophesy unto you: † they make you vain: they speak a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the LORD.

17 They say still unto them that despise me, The LORD hath said, Ye shall have peace; and they say unto every one that walketh after the imagination of his own heart, No evil shall come upon you.

18 For † who hath stood in the counsel of the LORD, and hath perceived and heard his word? who hath marked his word, and heard it!

19 Behold, a whirlwind of the LORD is gone forth in wrath, even a grievous whirlwind: it shall fall grievously upon the head of the wicked.

20 The anger of the LORD shall not return, until he hath executed, and till he have performed the thoughts of his heart: in the latter days ye shall consider it perfectly.

an imprecation annexed to them. So that the words import, that men ventured to forswear themselves, and incur the imprecation implied in an oath, rather than discover the truth. (Lowth.)

V. 13—15. The false prophets of Samaria, who had foolishly and impiously prophesied in the name of Baal, deluded the Israelites into those idolatries that ruined the nation: yet the Lord considered the false prophets of Jerusalem who prophesied lies in his name, as guilty of more horrible and abominable wickedness. For they were abandoned to adultery and deceit; and their prophesying was a constant imposture, by which the people were hardened and emboldened in iniquity, in the expectation of peace and prosperity; and prejudiced against the true prophets, who called on them to return from their wickedness. Thus the whole nation were become as odious to the Lord as the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; and would soon be visited with judgments almost as tremendous. But the prophets would be constrained to drink the most bitter part of this cup of God's indignation; as their false doctrine, pretended visions, and corrupt examples had spread impiety throughout the land, and frustrated all the means used to retard its progress. The prophets of Judah pronounced their prophecies in the name of the true God, and entitled him to all their impostures; the wickedness of their lives also reflected a dishonour on his name and religion. (Lowth.) They that should have profited by my rods against Samaria, are become worse than they. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16, 17. Make you vain. They deceive you, and soothe you into vain confidence. To despise God, is not only most wicked in itself, but the grand aggravation of all other atrocious sins. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. This may be understood as the scoffing language of the false prophets, that opposed Jeremiah and others, who declared to them the Lord's counsel to destroy them and the city. They therefore derived their pretensions to inspiration: and inquired which of them was of the Lord's privy counsel, and made acquainted with his secret? And whether they alone had perceived and heard his word? They thought it not likely that two or three inconsiderable persons should know more concerning the will of God, than the numbers of respectable persons among the priests and prophets, who predicted peace and prosperity: and they were amazed at the confidence with which they uttered their prophecies. But on the other hand the words may be interpreted as spoken by Jeremiah, demanding of the false prophets, which of them had received any revelation from God, or indeed understood any thing of his word? The context shows, that he designs by this question to exclude only the carnal or natural man, from being enlightened from above, or being a competent judge of divine truths. (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. If these prophets had really known God's purposes and intentions, they would not have said 'peace, peace,'—to the wicked; but have prophesied a grievous destruction just coming on them: for that is what will certainly come to pass; and the event will convince you of the truth of what I say. The sudden strokes of God's vengeance are often compared to a whirlwind. (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

—In the latter, &c. The execution of the predicted judgments would effectually convince the people, that the prophet spake by authority from JEHOVAH. In those future days, the surviving captives, at Babylon, and they who lost their lives, in the eternal world would have leisure fully to consider the subject; and then they would reflect on their own incredulity and obstinacy, with bitter remorse and indignation at themselves for their folly and madness. But the latter days generally means the times of the Messiah, and even the latest ages of the world; and the full consideration and understanding of their present unpa-railed dispersion after so many ages, and of the sins which provoked God thus to deal with their before highly favoured nation, will make way for the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land. (Note, xxx. 23, 24.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. 'He showeth the difference between the true prophets and the false; between the hireling and the true minister.' The Lord here solemnly disowned these prophets, who at that time promised the people peace. They forwardly engaged in the work, and their predictions coincided with the corrupt inclinations of the people: they ran of their own accord, and prophesied out of their own heart, and all went on very smoothly. But if indeed they had stood in the Lord's counsel, and had spoken his words to the people: their grand object would have been to bring them to repentance, and to turn them from all their idolatries and iniquities to the worship of JEHOVAH. This would have been the tendency of their lives and doctrine; and they would have had some measure of success. But their object, and the tendency and effect of their prognostications, were entirely the reverse of this.—If it be inquired, how the people might know the false prophets from those that were sent of God, when these wrought no miracles, the obvious answer is this: the ministry of the true prophets was coincident with the law of Moses, and its precepts, promises, threatenings, and predictions, and to the writings of the preceding prophets; whereas the false prophets, in their predictions, ran counter to these sacred records. The instructions and example of the true prophets evidently tended to bring men to repentance, faith, serious godliness, and universal righteousness; those of the false prophets led them to rest in forms and notions, and to be quiet in their sins: and these are still the rules by which the faithful ministers of Christ are to be distinguished from false teachers. (Note, Matt. vii. 15—23.) 'Giving encouragement to men's carnal security is often mentioned as a mark of a false prophet.' (Lowth.) But in respect of their immediate revelations, the ministry of the true prophets admitted of another kind of proof. No miracles, or even predictions, verified by the event, could prove him a true prophet, whose doctrine evidently contradicted any of the leading truths and precepts of the preceding Scriptures; (Note, Deut. xiii. 3.) In other cases the accomplishment of such predictions as related to their own times, generally sanctioned those that referred to more remote events. This was the case especially with Jeremiah. (Notes, xxii.)

V. 23, 24. Did the false prophets think to hide their crimes from God? or teach the people that he could not pursue them with his vengeance into distant countries, and detect their most secret crimes? Did they suppose that he only knew what was doing in heaven, and was not present on the earth also, or in those corners that lay most remote from human observation? Could they hope to avoid his inspection, or escape his vengeance, whose presence fills heaven and earth?

V. 25—27. The false prophets pretended revelations from God in supernatural dreams; and they got it rumoured abroad. But the Lord knew this to be an imposture: for they only spake their own conjectures, the result of the pride and presumption of their own deceitful hearts. Their evident purpose was, to seduce the people into forgetfulness of God, and contempt of his word; that they might graft idolatry and superstition on their infidelity, and so render them their attached and submissive followers.—'The giving heed to the false prophets is as effectual a way of making my people forget me and my laws, as the setting up an idolatrous way of worship, which hath been too successfully practised by their fathers.' (Lowth.)

V. 28, 29. Let then the matter be brought to decision between the different descriptions of prophets: let these dreamers declare openly their dreams, and let the true prophets faithfully deliver their message; and the difference would be as evident to the impartial inquirer, as that between the chaff and the wheat. The dreams of the false prophets would appear slight, superficial, and only calculated to flatter the pride and soothe the consciences of ungodly men: but the word of God, faithfully spoken by his servants, would appear weighty, interesting, suited to alarm the sinner's conscience, and to excite reverent

God's authority, and conducive to repentance and holiness. For "is not the word of God like fire?" This element penetrates, enlivens, illuminates, softens, melts, purifies, consumes, or transforms, every substance into its own nature. Thus the sacred word penetrates the conscience, quickens and illuminates the mind, softens and melts the heart, purifies the affections, consumes the dross of sin, and transforms the believer's soul into its own holy nature. As a hammer, also, it breaks down the presumptuous confidence of the proud and stout-hearted, and renders them broken and contrite in spirit; and it crushes the rebellion and obstinacy of the will, and produces humble submission and obedience. This is the genuine tendency of the uncorrupted word of God, and these effects are produced where it is truly believed: but false doctrine is coincident with the pride and lusts of the human heart; and the more firmly it is believed, the faster are the chains of sin riveted, and the more is conscience stupified in impenitence, and the will in obstinate rebellion.

V. 30. The false prophets caught up some of the phrases of the true prophets, and such things as suited their purpose: and this served to give plausibility to the lying predictions which they intermingled with them.

V. 32. The word rendered lightness, is understood by some to mean inconstancy, a frivolous accommodation to the varying humours of the people; by others flattery; and by others boasting, namely, of their revelations. (Num. xxiv. 3, 4. 2 Pet. ii. 15—19. Jude 16.)

V. 33—40. (Note, Isaiah xiii. 1.) The prophets frequently called their prophecies "Burdens," especially when they related to divine judgments: and their opposers ridiculed the expression. So that, by way of exposing them for delivering so many terrible predictions, they used deridingly to ask, "What is the burden of the LORD?" To this Jeremiah was commanded to answer, that "the LORD would forsake them," and then their miseries would indeed be a heavy burden. He did not mean, that God would finally forsake the nation, but that he would forsake those mockers, and that rebellious generation. And if any of them dared to use that expression in derision any more, the Lord declared that he would severely punish that man and his house. He therefore directed them what words to use in such cases, that they might not ridicule the language of the Holy Spirit. But as they would pervert his words, who was "the living God, the LORD of Hosts, their God;" he would make their own words fall on them as a heavy burden, and execute the predicted judgments with unrelenting severity. As we find some of the succeeding prophets used the same expression, it is plain that God did not mean to restrict his servants from using, but his enemies from deriding, this word, (Zech. ix. 1.)

Every man must render an account to God of the talents committed to his stewardship; and "to whom much hath been given, of him will much be required." Men must also be answerable to God for the mischief that arises from their neglect of duty, as well as for their other crimes. Wo then be to those rulers, who abuse their authority to destroy and scatter their subjects! who oppress and plunder those whom they are commissioned to protect! Or who suffer them to be enslaved, oppressed, slaughtered, or scattered by private depredators, or foreign enemies, through their ambition, avarice, luxury, or negligence! But still deeper guilt is contracted by the pastors of God's flock, the professed rulers and teachers of the Church, who abuse their authority, neglect their work, are greedy of filthy lucre, and persecute those whom they ought to tend and feed. The true sheep of Christ, however, shall not be lost, through the negligence or wickedness of such pastors. Their great and good Shepherd, who is the Lord of Hosts, will gather them from every district of the earth into his fold; and there he will place over them able, faithful, diligent, and tender shepherds, to feed and tend them: and he himself will protect them by his power, and support them by his grace from terror and dismay; and not one of them shall be wanting, when he shall come finally to separate betwixt the sheep and the goats. For this righteous Branch hath been raised up unto David, and now reigns as Immanuel on the mediatorial throne; to execute judgment on his enemies, and to save and defend his people: and in him, as "The Lord our Righteousness," believers are "justified, and glory;" of his Spirit they all partake, and are taught to love, to obey, and imitate him, in whom is all their salvation. "To him shall the gathering of the people be;" his redemption is far more glorious than all former deliverances of his Church: here the glory of God is peculiarly displayed, and it is our grand privilege to have such a Prophet, Priest, and King: may our souls be gathered to him, and found in him; and may Jews and Gentiles, and all the inhabitants of the earth, become the subjects of "The Lord our righteousness!"

V. 9—32.

Whilst we rejoice in our privileges, if we be zealous for the glory of God, and have compassion for our fellow-sinners, we cannot but be deeply concerned, when we consider the present state of mankind, and even that of the visible Church. It might well fill us with consternation and amazement, and prompt us to such earnestness in endeavouring to convince men of their guilt and misery, as would be despised by carnal men, and mistaken for inebriation or insanity, (Notes, Acts ii. 13—15. 2 Cor. v. 10—14.) to compare the words of God's holiness in the sacred Scriptures, with the doctrine of most teachers, and the lives of most professed Christians. For it is evident that they are wretchedly deceived, and deceiving each other into a false peace, when the heavy wrath of God is ready to fall upon them. Whilst even in this favoured land men seem ambitious to exceed the adulteries and lewdness of the reprobate Jews, there can be no doubt but a far heavier load of perjury rests upon us; which, being connected with the system of political government and judicial transactions, and even ecclesiastical affairs, is in the strictest sense a national sin. "Because of swear-storation of the Jews, carried captive with Jeconiah; and the increasing wickedness and total ruin of those who remained in the land, 4—10.

"ing" our land ought to mourn in deep repentance: and if it do not, it may justly be apprehended, that ere long it will mourn under desolating judgments, which may turn all our pleasant places into a wilderness. But, alas! the course in which men in general proceed is evil; and too often authority and influence give energy to natural depravity, to urge them on more forcibly in sin. And are not many of our priests and prophets ungodly? Does not the Lord find their wickedness in his house, and even at his table? And do not numbers thus provoke God to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts, till they are driven headlong into destruction? Perhaps God more abhors those who profess to preach his truth, but pervert it by their lies, and disgrace it by their vices, than those who openly abet the cause of infidelity and irreligion. He sees it very horrible when the wicked examples of the teachers combine with their soothing and plausible instructions to embolden evil doers in their crimes, and to quiet the consciences of the impenitent and unbelieving; and though men may attempt to palliate these abominations, they are in the eyes of the Lord as vile as the inhabitants of Sodom, and it will be less tolerable for them in the day of judgment. For from such teachers, profaneness goes forth throughout the land: the principles and morals of the people are poisoned at the fountain-head; and hence originate those torrents of infidelity, impiety, and profligacy, which overwhelm whole nations, and ripen them for destruction. Yet they that will hearken to such teachers as speak from their own hearts, and not out of the mouth of the Lord, and whose doctrine tends to render them vain and ungodly, must be answerable for it: for it is easy to distinguish them from those who stand in the counsel of the Lord, and hear his word; especially as he hath promised to give wisdom to them who lack it, and pray for it. It is plain that many run before they are sent of God; and that they only aim to obtain preferment or reputation, and not to bring sinners to repentance, to faith in Christ, and newness of life: and therefore they scruple not to promise peace to those who despise the Lord, and who walk after the imagination of their own hearts. It is evident that this is the tendency and effect of much public teaching: men, destitute of the fear of God, and without conscientiousness in their general conduct, are emboldened by it to hope well of their state, and even to deem themselves interested in all the privileges of the gospel. Some of these teachers dream dreams of the deceit of their own hearts, and are continually inventing new refinements in infidelity or enthusiasm, which cause the people to forget the Lord, and his holy truths and precepts; to take a part of the Bible for the whole; to establish new creeds, or to separate doctrinal truths from their practical tendency. Some again retail other men's inventions, and steal scraps of divinity from their neighbours, and preach, (without any judgment of their own,) what other men have compiled for them; to indulge their laziness, and to gratify their own avarice. Others pick up a few notions and expressions from faithful

THE LORD shewed me, and, behold, two baskets of figs were set before the temple of the LORD, after that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon had carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, and the princes of Judah, with the carpenters and smiths, from Jerusalem, and had brought them to Babylon.

One basket had very good figs, even like the figs that are very ripe: and the other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, * they were so bad.

3 Then said the LORD unto me, What seest thou, Jeremiah? And I said, Figs; the good figs, very good, and the evil, very evil, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.

4 ¶ Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

5 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel: Like these good figs, so will I acknowledge † them that are carried away captive of Judah, whom I have sent out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans for their good.

6 For I will set mine eyes upon them for good, and I will bring them again to this land: and I will build them, and not pull them down; and I will plant them, and not pluck them up.

7 And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the LORD: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me for their whole heart.

ministers; and by additions, alterations, or perversions, enervate and corrupt them, and cause the people to err by their lies and lightness. But what is all this chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Cannot they be distinguished from each other? Let the word of God be faithfully and fully preached, and the difference will soon appear, in its nature, tendency, and effects: for the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword; it comes to the heart and conscience with authority and conviction; it tends to instruct and alarm, to break the hard, and to humble the proud heart: it leads to repentance, to faith, and holiness: it enlightens, quickens, purifies, and renews the soul: it is no smooth, lulling, stupefying message; but resembles the fire and the hammer that breaketh the rocks in pieces. And by these emblems, this tendency, and these effects, and by the spirit and example of true ministers of Christ, the real word of God may be distinguished as certainly from false doctrines, taught by carnal preachers, as the wheat may be known from the worthless chaff. No fair appearances or pretences can conceal the hypocrisy, ambition, avarice, or infidelity of false professors or teachers from the omnipresent heart-searching Judge. He hears all their words, and sees their thoughts; he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the counsels of their hearts: and when his vengeance shall fall grievously upon the head of the wicked, and he hath performed the thoughts of his heart respecting them, they will perfectly consider, and effectually be convinced of those truths, which before they would not believe.

V. 33—40.

It is a mark of great and daring impiety for men to jest with the words of God, or to ridicule the expressive language of faithful ministers. The enmity of the carnal heart works greatly in thus perverting the words of the living God: they who expect impunity in sin, and despise or abuse the salvation of the Gospel, are always prone to revile or deride those who, in the most scriptural manner, preach to sinners their danger of eternal damnation: and numbers only inquire concerning the word of God for their diversion, or to ridicule it. But every idle and profane word will add to the sinner's insupportable burden of wrath and misery, in the day when the Judge shall bid him "depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;" and when, being forsaken of God, everlasting shame and reproach will be his portion. Let us then so inquire after the word of the Lord, that we may believe, reverence, and obey it, for our good.

V. 5. 'The Jews, who were left in their own country, thought themselves better beloved of God, than their brethren who were carried away captive. To check this vain confidence, God promises to show the latter particular signs of his favour in a strange land; and to show distinguishing marks of his displeasure on the former.' (Lanthe.)

V. 6. (Marg. Ref.) V. 7. Many of the more pious Jews were carried away captive with Jeconiah, or before him, among whom were Daniel and his companions, and Ezekiel likewise. The afflictions of the captives were suited to humble and lead them to repentance; whilst those who remained at Jerusalem became more and more hardened in presumption and rebellion. But whatever means were used, the power of divine grace effected the grand difference betwixt them. The Lord promised to give the captives a heart, (a proper disposition of mind,) to know him, in the glory of his perfections, and in his relations unto them: and this knowledge would induce them to renounce all idols and iniquities, and to return to his worship and service with their whole heart. And thus they would be

CHAP. XXV.

A review of the messages sent by Jeremiah to the Jews during twenty-three years; and their contempt of them reproved, acknowledged as his people, and he would be their God, their Portion, Protector, and Salvation: and he would take care of them as a man would of the best and most valued produce of the fig-tree. Doubtless a great reformation and revival of religion took place among the captives, and by them and their descendants the land was afterwards chiefly replenished: for they who remained in Judea, were in general destroyed, or driven into Egypt, whence few, if any of them returned; or they were carried to distant regions, and detained in slavery. But some expressions lead us to suppose, that the Spirit of prophecy looked forward to the present dispersion of the unbelieving Jews in all the nations of the earth, and all the debasing circumstances attending it. 'To the first captives chiefly those blessings belong, which are promised to the Jews upon their return from captivity; such as were the knowledge and fear of God, and grace to live in obedience to his commandments. But I conceive the eminent completion of this prophecy will be at the time of the general restoration of that nation.' (Louth.)

V. 3-10. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The professors of true religion are presented before God, to be devoted to his glory, and employed in doing good to mankind; as the first fruits of the fig-tree were brought to the temple, to be used by the priests and Levites. Indeed, none of the human race are so good and useful as true believers; but none are so vile and worthless as hypocrites: thus the good are very good, and the bad very bad, more than among other men. (Matt. v. 13.) But the Lord often spares those longest, and exempts them most from present suffering, whom he hath appointed unto wrath. As many as he loves he rebukes and chastens: and when the loss of estates, liberty, and country, and a complication of hardships and calamities, are sanctified to the saving of their souls, these appear to be the methods by which God acknowledges his choice of them, and his purpose of doing them good. He alone can remove the pride, enmity, and blindness of the carnal mind, and give men hearts to know, fear, love, and trust in him: when this change takes place, they cordially return to him in his appointed way. Thus they become his accepted obedient servants and worshippers; and he becomes their God and Father. Thenceforth he will comfort them under all their trials, deliver them from every enemy, and set his eyes upon them for good, and that for ever. Let those who desire these blessings beg of God to give them a heart to know him. And let us remember, that it is in this way that the Lord preserves a Church on earth; whilst multitudes of professed Christians, without respect of rank or external distinction, are given up to complicated contempt and misery, for a warning to others not to copy their crimes, nor to presume upon their privileges: and this consideration should direct our prayers, and encourage our hopes, respecting a final prevalence of the Gospel throughout the earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1. Nebuchadrezzar, or Nebuchadnezzar. 'The first year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign,' according to the scripture-account, is coincident with the end of the third, and the beginning of the fourth, year of Jehoiakim. Two years Nebuchadnezzar reigned with his father. Daniel, writing in Chaldee, follows the computation in use among the Chaldeans.' (Louth.) This fixes the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's reign two years later; namely, from the time in which he began to reign alone. (Note, Dan. ii. 1.)

V. 9. Nebuchadrezzar did not mean to serve God, but to gratify his own ambition by his conquests; but the Lord intended to employ him as the executioner of his righteous vengeance: and he gave notice of it, as soon as Nebuchadrezzar came to the throne, to make it generally known that his future success and greatness were a part of the plan of JEHOVAH.

V. 14.—The nations and kings, which confederated with Cyrus.

V. 15-17. The nature of the case determines this to have been a figurative representation, and not a real transaction ; for the prophet could not have performed literally the things here commanded : but this was not the case in respect of some other transactions, which many suppose to have only been done in vision. (Note, xiii. 1—11.) It was in this way revealed to the prophet, and he was ordered to publish it as widely as he could, that the vengeance of God would be executed on all the surrounding nations, as well as on the Jews, by Nebuchadrezzar and his Chaldeans. The wrath of God, and its fatal effects, when men are judicially left to infatuation and rage, and to rush upon their own destruction, are aptly represented by a cup of intoxicating liquor, mingled with poisonous ingredients ; such as was commonly given to condemned criminals, in order to end their wretched lives.

V. 18. As it is this day. This relates to the desolations of Judea and Jerusalem, when all that had been foretold by Jeremiah was fulfilled ; and therefore must have been added by Baruch, or by Ezra, or whoever it was that collected Jeremiah's prophecies into one volume. (Lowth.) As the prophet lived to witness the completion of these predictions, it is not at all unlikely, that he himself added the clause to the copies that were afterwards written ; from which it might be inserted also in the others.

nected with them : though some think that the several nations, dwelling on the Mediterranean sea, are intended. (Marg. Ref.) The kings mentioned here, and in the following verses, were petty princes of several clans and colonies. The title of king is given in Scripture to any ruler or governor. (Lowth.)

V. 22. (Marg. Ref.) V. 23. (Marg. Ref. Note, ix. 26.) Little satisfactory information can be added, about several of the tribes or nations mentioned in this passage, beyond what may be collected by consulting the marginal references.

V. 24. Mingled. The learned Dr. Pococke is of opinion, that the word Arabia is derived from the Hebrew word Arab, signifying mixture. Because the country was inhabited by a medley of several nations. (Lowth.)

V. 25. Zimri. A people of Arabia, descended from Zimran, Abraham's son by Keturah. (Lowth.)

V. 26. The world. The kingdoms within the extent of the Babylonish empire, which called itself Empress of the world. So oikoumene, (all the world,) is put for the Roman empire. (Luke i. 1.) (Lowth.) (Dan. ii. 33. iv. 22. v. 19.) Some render the clause, "All the kingdoms of every region which lies beyond this land," that is, the countries all round about Chaldaea. Sheshach evidently means Babylon ; though it is not certain on what account it was so called. When the kings of Babylon had executed the predicted vengeance on these nations, they would in their turn be punished for their still more enormous wickedness. (Marg. Ref.)

CHAP. XXVI.

Jeremiah, delivering an awful message at the temple, is persecuted by the priests and prophets, 1—9. He pleads his cause before the princes, exhorts them to repent, and warns them not to shed innocent blood, 10—15. The princes acquit him, referring to the example of Micah, 16—19. Urijah, prophesying in like manner, is persecuted; and fleeing into Egypt, is fetched thence by Jehoiakim and slain, 20—23. Ahikam protects Jeremiah, 24.

IN the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, came this word from the LORD, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD; ^b Stand in the court of the LORD's house, and speak unto all the cities of Judah, which come to worship in the LORD's house, ^c all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; ^d diminish not a word:

will do no hurt to those, however vile they have been, who truly obey this command, and accede to this invitation: and that no good can come to those who provoke him by impenitent wickedness; that no profession, or creed, or forms, can profit those who are not turned from the evil of their doings. He keeps an exact register of our sins and the aggravations of them, and of our abused mercies and means of grace; and thus the continued neglect of the warnings of his faithful ministers exceedingly hastens the execution of his judgments. The earnestness with which the servants of God labour, and the fervency with which they pray for the salvation of souls, afford a striking contrast to the supineness and negligence of most men about their own salvation! Our God is sincere in all his invitations, and faithful to all his promises; he rejoiceth in mercy, and delighteth not in the death of the wicked. How soon will they, who refuse to seek happiness in his favour, be deprived of every source of transient joy! All miseries on earth, however, are temporal, and have an appointed period; but the wrath to come is perpetual, yea, eternal. The Lord employs wicked men as his servants, and when they have executed his vengeance on others, to gratify their own vile passions, he punishes them for their wickedness. And every threatening of Scripture will be as certainly accomplished, as those have been that relate to Babylon and Jerusalem.

V. 15—33.

How grand and awful a view have we, in this passage, given us of divine providence! How affecting, of the state of fallen man! The judgments of God have ever been going their rounds from one nation to another, and have never been suffered to rest; because of the wickedness of mankind! When we consider the fury and rage, with which the nations of the earth have, in every age, rushed upon mutual carnage and destruction; we must allow, that their conduct hath resembled that of men who are intoxicated and mad: but we need not wonder at these effects, when we reflect that they have been drinking of the cup of God's indignation, and have been given up to their own mad passions, to execute his vengeance on each other. This emblem also may instruct us what an odious and pernicious vice drunkenness is; and how dreadful the wrath of God must be to those who fall under it to rise no more. It is vain to struggle against the sentence which he hath denounced, or to object to his righteousness: he will constrain men to drink of this bitter cup; he will destroy them with his avenging sword. He will not even spare those cities or persons who have been called by his name; but if his judgments begin with degenerate professors of Christianity, let not the impious and profligate expect to be altogether unpunished. From his holy habitation he will utter his voice against all flesh. He hath just ground of controversy with every nation and every individual, and he will plead against them, and execute judgment on all the wicked. Thus evil goes from nation to nation: no tongue can express the miseries that have been endured, or the multitudes that have perished, by the great scourges of the world, who successively have been raised up, run their course, and been destroyed. We have abundant cause to be thankful, that ours are yet peaceable habitations: but many, which were so for a time, have been cut down, because of the fierce anger of the Lord. When he leaves his place to execute judgment, or withdraws his protection from offending nations, the days of slaughter arrive, and lands are soon left desolate, or groaning under the iron rod of oppression: and then the chief in rank and authority are most exposed to peril and suffering, and are generally the least able to escape, or to endure hardship. But the Lord will preserve his people in all changes: and whatever removes them from this world of sin and sorrow, they will then enter into those peaceful mansions, where war, changes, sickness, and death, can find no admission; because no sin will be found therein for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 2. 'The great court was the place where both men and women did ordinarily worship, when they brought no sacrifice: for when they brought sacrifice, they were to bring it into the inner court,—or 'that of the priests.' (Lightfoot.) This prophecy being delivered in the courts of the temple, on a public occasion, before the priests and false prophets as well as the people, was likely to exasperate the minds of the hardened offenders, especially of those in authority and reputation: and therefore the prophet was expressly commanded not to diminish a word from it: as he might have been tempted to do, especially as Urijah had been put to death for his faithfulness, probably just before.

Diminish. 'Either out of fear, favour, or flattery.' (Leath.)

the people unto the priests, and to the prophets, This man is not worthy to die: for he hath spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God.

17 Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying,

18 Micah the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, and spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; and Zion shall be plowed like a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest.

19 Did Hezekiah king of Judah, and all Judah put him at all to death? did he not fear the LORD, and besought the LORD, and the LORD repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them? Thus might we procure great evil against our souls.

20 And there was also a man that prophesied in the name of the LORD, Urijah, the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, who prophesied against this city, and against this land, according to all the words of Jeremiah:

21 And when Jehoiakim the king, with all his mighty men, and all the princes, heard his words, the king sought to put him to death: but when Urijah heard it, he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt;

22 And Jehoiakim the king sent men into Egypt, namely, Elnathan the son of Achbor, and certain men with him into Egypt.

23 And they fetched forth Urijah out of Egypt, and brought him unto Jehoiakim the king: who slew him with the sword, and cast his dead body into the graves of the common people.

24 Nevertheless the hand of Ahikam the son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, that they should not give him into the hand of the people to put him to death.

V. 16—19. Some expositors consider the remainder of this chapter as the debate which took place in the Sanhedrim, or council, on the case of Jeremiah; but as the people were present, part of the time at least, and as no mention is made of the council, but merely of the princes and certain elders, perhaps what is here recorded took place in the court of the temple; and the subsequent verses were added by the prophet, to illustrate the narrative.—‘The people, who before were forward to condemn him; now, upon hearing his apology, were as ready to acquit him.’ (Louth.) They before united with the priests and prophets; but now some of them concurred with the princes, who refused to pronounce the sentence of death against Jeremiah, (24.) ‘Not against this man the sentence of death.’ (Note, 11.) It does not appear, whether ‘the elders of the land’ were some of the princes before mentioned; or other eminent persons, who adduced before appositely the example of Micah, and quoted his words in support of their determination, and against the rash judgment of priests and prophets. (Note, Mic. iv. 12.) There is no satisfactory ground in the following history, to conclude that either these princes, or elders in general, so attended to the message of God, as to repent of their sins, or to attempt a public reformation; though they seem at this time to have had transient convictions, which the Lord made use of for his servant’s preservation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—23. ‘This seems to be an instance alleged by others of the Sanhedrim, in favour of the priests and prophets who were for condemning Jeremiah.’ (Louth.) If the narrative was added by the sacred writer, he meant to magnify the power and goodness of God in preserving him against the persecuting violence of Jehoiakim, as well as that of the priests and prophets. Urijah seems to have been very faithful in delivering his message, but faulty in relinquishing his work, and fleeing into Egypt for fear of Jehoiakim; as if he dared not to stand to what he had said. Jehoiakim, by burying Urijah ‘in the graves of the common people,’ intended to render him and his prediction contemptible among his subjects. Had the king and people imitated Hezekiah, the Lord would have averted the threatened judgments, as he had done in that pious prince’s time: nor would Nebuchadnezzar have been able to take the city, any more than Sennacherib had been. But God foresaw, that both rulers and people would bring destruction on themselves by impentence, and by murdering his prophets.

V. 24. ‘Which declareth that nothing could have appeased their fury, if God had not moved this noble man to stand valiantly in his defence.’ Both Shaphan and Ahikam were employed by Josiah in his reformation, and were his principal ministers; and several of Ahikam’s brethren or near relations seem to have been principal persons during the reign of Jehoiakim and his successors; so that his influence must have been very great. His son Gedaliah was appointed ruler over the remnant of Jews, left in the land by Nebuchadnezzar after the destruction of Jerusalem; and he appears to have been a man of good character. So that it is not improbable that Ahikam was a pious man; though, except on this occasion, he did not boldly espouse the cause of the prophet. (Marg. Ref.)

[PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The ambassadors of God should speak his word with all boldness, and adhere strictly to their instructions: but in so

CHAP. XXVII.

Jeremiah is directed to make yokes and bonds; to wear one on his own neck, and to send them to several kings by their ambassadors, with a command from the Creator of the world to submit to the king of Babylon, if they would escape doing they will often be exposed to danger, and to the censure even of their more timid and less zealous friends. A minister of religion, who diminishes aught from the message which he is sent to deliver, is as justly chargeable with unfaithfulness, as he who alters any thing in it; we should therefore be very diligent in obtaining an acquaintance with the whole revealed counsel of God, as well as careful to declare it without respect of persons. It must not be expected, that the Lord will abate any thing of what he requires, or make any alteration in his method of delivering sinners from deserved punishment. It is his invariable rule to pour contempt on all external distinctions and performances, when men rest in them, and neglect the power of godliness: and indeed the most implacable enemies to true religion have often been most zealous for forms and notions; especially when their interests and characters were concerned. It hath therefore sometimes been safer to denounce the judgments of God against wicked princes, and even in the palaces of kings, (Notes xxii.) than in the precincts of the temple, and before hypocritical priests and prophets; who have in every age been ready to inquire of those, whom the Lord has employed as his messengers, by whose authority they did such things; and to pronounce them worthy to die for doing his will! They have also frequently seduced the people into such an unaccountable reverence for them, that they have been ready to concur in their persecuting designs, without further inquiry!

It is evidently desirable, that, in every nation, the power of decision in all criminal causes should finally be vested in the civil government: for even where princes are irreligious, they are not influenced by so many personal motives or resentments, as profligate ecclesiastics are; and more justice may be expected even from a Pilate than from a Caiaphas. But how shameful is it, when they who bear the sacred character, stand forward to persecute the servants of God, and wrest their words in testifying against them! and when, after all, the magistrates show that they have done no evil; nay, justify their conduct from the examples and precepts of Scripture! It behooves those who are most earnest in the cause of God, to be proportionably calm and resigned in their own concerns; it suffices to show that they act in obedience to him and confide in his protection; and it is very proper that they should express more regard for the good of their persecutors, than for their own personal safety; taking the opportunity of meekly warning them not to add the guilt of murder or oppression to their other sins, but to amend their lives, that it may be well with them: as all men may destruction, 1—11. He counsels Zedekiah to the same effect; warns him and the people against false prophets; and predicts further desolations, 12—22.

IN the beginning of the reign of a Je-^{13 12 19, 20}hoiakim the son of Josiah King of Judah, came this word unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, know for certain, that injuring or putting to death their faithful reprovers will hasten and increase the punishments of individuals and communities. The more pious any man is, the less apt will he be to resent the most pointed Scriptural reproofs and warnings: for such persons profit continually by this plain dealing, and are led to fear God, and seek his favour with increasing earnestness; and thus they escape the threatened condemnation. Of what great importance is it to be well versed in the Scripture history: for apposite references may be made to it on almost every occasion, and directions deduced from it, to regulate our conduct! It seems a light matter to conclude, that they are not worthy to be put to death, who have spoken the word of the Lord: yet they may generally think themselves greatly favoured, who are thus protected, though they have no other recompense from man. For many whose consciences testify to the character of the faithful minister, and to the truth of his words, and who will occasionally countenance him, from conviction or personal respect, will not obey the commands of God delivered by him, but go on in sin to their own destruction. No enmity is more implacable, than that excited by faithful reproof; or more dangerous, when the proud transgressor hath power to gratify it: but none can go further than the Lord is pleased to permit; and they who are employed in his service, and abide in their proper work and place, have no reason to fear man. Extraordinary cases call for extraordinary firmness: but though the servants of God agree in the substance of their ministry, they do not all possess equal constancy and intrepidity; nor do the same persons at all times. The persecuted minister may change the scene of his labours, and thus flee from one city to another: but he must not run away from his work, or shelter himself from danger in those places where he can have no opportunity of usefulness. They who most honour God by confidence in him, and zeal for his glory, shall be peculiarly honoured by him: but such as appear to distrust him, and to despise his word, will be proportionably disgraced, rebuked, and laid aside. The Lord can raise up friends to his people, where they least expected them: and he will honour and recompense those who show kindness to such as are persecuted and oppressed for his sake.

As Zedekiah is afterwards mentioned through this whole transaction, it seems to have been by an error of some early transcriber, that the name of Jehoiakim is here substituted. Yet several interpreters suppose, that the prophet had the vision in the reign of Jehoiakim; but was not ordered to make the yokes and bonds according to it, till the reign of Ze-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Ministers should always take the lead in every kind of self-denial or self-abasement, which they inculcate on others; and they will be supported under every hardship, which they meet with in the path of duty. Opposition to the growing power and despotic rule of earthly conquerors and tyrants, should always be conducted in submission to the authority of God, and with every means of obtaining his peace and favour: for the most powerful confederacies will be broken, that are cemented by impiety and rebellion against him. The whole earth is the property, as well as the work of its omnipotent Creator; and he giveth it to whomsoever it seemeth meet to him: but the character of those who have had the largest share of its power and riches allotted to them, teaches us how very worthless he deems such acquisitions, compared with spiritual blessings. The Lord does not now expressly inform us, whom he hath appointed to rule the nations; and therefore the efforts of men to defend their liberties from usurpers or invaders, are not indiscriminately to be condemned. But when his will is made known by the event, it behoves us in our private capacity to consider "the powers that be" as "as ordained of God," and to submit to them according to the laws and constitution of our country ; without respect to their characters or conduct, for which they must render an account to their own Master. As every comfort or calamity is at the disposal of God ; it must in all cases be our interest to obey his will, by what means soever it is made known : and they who will not believe this, will be convinced of it by the event, and of the fallacy of all the reasonings and devices, by which they were encouraged to seek happiness in following their own inclinations. But if all men are bound to obey God, as far as they are able in any way to discover his will, how inexcusable are they, who live at the fountain-head of instruction, and have repeated warnings, exhortations, and encouragements sent to them, and yet persist in their rebellion ! They may be said to be in love with death, and bent on their own destruction : and those who encourage them to expect impunity, by contradicting God's word and speaking lies in his name, are more criminal than the diviners and sorcerers of the Gentiles, and will be answerable for the souls which perish by their means. But time-servers, who accommodate their instructions to the inclinations and wishes of men, especially of those in authority, will too generally be more acceptable to the great, than the faithful ministers of Christ. Yet whilst they promise the impenitent and unbelieving increasing prosperity, they have no power or interest in heaven, by which they may avert the most dreadful calamities : and it will be too late to remedy the mischief, when the event has proved them deceivers. But if it be better to submit to those whom Providence places over us, and to live in peace and to eat the bread of honesty by labour, than to seek great things by turbulence and hazarding the loss of life or property, how good must it be to submit to Christ, "whose yoke is easy and whose burden is light, that we may find rest to our souls !" For all, who refuse this subjection and neglect his salvation, must be finally and eternally miserable ; notwithstanding all their own presumptuous hopes, and the delusions of those who confidently promise them safety in unbelief and disobedience.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. 'This plainly refers to the time specified, at the beginning of the former chapter, and confirms the conjecture there made, that Jehoiakim is put there, by a mistake of the copies, for Zedekiah.' (Louth.) (Note, xxvii. 1.)

V. 2—4. This false prophet imitated the style and manner of the true prophets : but he unconditionally promised prosperity to an abandoned generation ; and did not so much as exhort them to repentance or reformation ; (xxiii. 14. 17.) It was just such a message as some men call pure Gospel ; all encouragement, promise, and privilege, without warning, discrimination of character, exhortation, or precept.

Jecooniah. 'This was grateful news to the people, who looked upon Zedekiah only as Nebuchadnezzar's deputy.' (Louth.) It seems by this, that Hananiah was more desirous of popular than regal favour : for his prediction could not be altogether agreeable to Zedekiah. But he evidently was a weak as well as a wicked prince, and was very generally despised.

V. 6. Amen, &c. The prophet thus expressed his fervent love to his people. He would have been glad that

CHAP. XXIX.

Jeremiah, by letter, requires the captives at Babylon to accommodate themselves to their condition; and not to believe the false prophets, who promised them a speedy deliverance, 1—9. He promises them a gracious restoration at the end of seventy years, 10—14. He foretells the destruction of those who remained at Jerusalem, 15—19; and shows the dreadful end of two false prophets at Babylon, 20—23. Semaiah, writes a letter from Babylon against Jeremiah, 24—29. His doom is foretold, 30—32.

NOW these are the words of the letter that Jeremiah the prophet sent from Jerusalem unto the residue of the elders which were carried away captives, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people, whom Nebuchadnezzar had carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon,

2 (After that Jeconiah the king, and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah and Jerusalem, and the carpenters, and the smiths, were departed from Jerusalem,)

3 By the hand of Elasah the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah the son of Hilkiah, (whom Zedekiah king of Judah sent unto Babylon to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon,) saying,

4 Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon;

5 Build ye houses, and dwell in them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them;

6 Take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters; and take wives for your sons, and give your daughters to husbands, that they may bear sons and daughters; that ye may be increased there, and not diminished.

7 And seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captives; and pray unto the Lord for it: for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace.

nity and prosperity. This so flatly contradicts the whole tenour of Scripture, that none, who are acquainted with it and reverence it, can be deluded by them. Those ministers who are most full of love and compassion for sinners, and most fervently pray for and seek their salvation, will be the most determined not to flatter their pride, nor soothe their consciences, with delusive hopes. They will most plainly declare the alarming as well as the encouraging parts of the sacred oracles; and call men to repentance, faith, and holiness, as indispensably necessary in order to escape the present and future wrath of God. Such as are most solemn in these warnings and exhortations, copy the examples of the prophets and apostles, and men of God, who have been before them: but smooth teachers, who deal only in comfort and unqualified promises and assurances of peace and safety, without discriminating betwixt the precious and the vile among the people, tread in the steps of the false prophets, and the event will prove that the Lord did not send them: while the tendency of false doctrine, to teach men rebellion against God, always distinguishes it from the true Gospel of Christ, which encourages men to repent, and turn to God, and to do works meet for repentance; but gives no encouragement to continue in sin.—The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle “unto all men.” He must recede from his right, yield to violence, bear reviling with patience, and leave God to vindicate his character and plead his cause. The truth may be run down, overborne, and trampled on; but it cannot be kept down; like its divine Author, it will rise again, to the confusion of all who hate it. Every attempt of ungodly men to escape the wrath, or frustrate the purpose of God, will rivet their fetters and increase their miseries: and they, who encourage them in such rebellious efforts, by causing them to trust in a lie, must expect the first, or the largest, portion of divine vengeance.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. Residue. Many of the elders, and others might die, by the hardships which they suffered on the road; or be cut off by the conquerors.

—Prophets. It does not appear that there was any true prophet at Babylon, when this letter was sent; except Ezekiel, and Daniel, who was newly entered on the prophetic office. But there were several, who were accounted prophets, and who had great influence over the people; and therefore the letter was addressed to them, along with the elders and priests. The Septuagint read it, false prophets, but they would hardly, in that character, have been thus addressed; especially as the letter was particularly intended to warn the people against the false prophets.

V. 2. Queen Jeconiah’s mother. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. These persons seem to have been sent by Zedekiah, to ratify some treaty with Nebuchadnezzar, or to make some submissions to him.

V. 4—7. The vain expectation of a speedy return to their own land, which the false prophets excited in the Jews at Babylon, led them to neglect their own interests and comfort, and the good of the nation; and tended to betray them into measures that would excite the jealousy of the victors, and increase their own miseries. But the prophet, in the name of God, directed them to consider Babylon as their home, and to take the best care they could of themselves, their families, and the nation; to use their influence and endeavours to promote the public peace; and to pray for the welfare of the city, as the way to obtain peace to themselves. These directions tended to render them patient and contented, industrious and useful, and as comfortable as their situation would admit of. This department, and their constant prayers in all their religious assemblies, for the welfare of the community, would tend to conciliate the rulers. Most of them must end their lives at Babylon, and share the calamities and many of the advantages of that city, all their days; and their posterity must do the same, till the expiration of the appointed period. It was therefore both reasonable and prudent to pray, that there might be peace in that place where the Lord had assigned them their habitations: and as far as they believed his word they would do it. The Lord had caused them to be carried captive, or all the power of the Chaldeans could not have effected it: and his will ought to be submitted to in this dispensation. (20.) 'It is the duty of all private persons to submit to the government that protects them, and to pray for the prosperity of it. And if they are persecutors, or enemies to the truth, they are to leave it to God to execute on them the judgments he has denounced against tyrants and oppressors; which threatenings the Jews expected God would execute upon Babylon in due time.' (Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9.) (Louth.)— To pray for the peace of a city or country, and for the health or eternal salvation of the rulers, is very different from wishing success to their ambitious, rapacious, or sanguinary undertakings; though this distinction is not always attended to. May not the surprising change, which took place in the character of Nebuchadnezzar, (Notes, Dan. iv.) be considered as an answer to the prayers of the pious Jews for him; as the conversion of Saul was to the prayers of the Christians for their persecutors? And may not even they, who live under the most oppressive persecutors, take an encouraging hint from this consideration, as to their duty in such circumstances?

V. 8. Case, &c. By the encouragement which the Jews gave to those who promised them speedy deliverance, they, as it were, bespoke these dreams; and unprincipled men would be sure to furnish such prognostications as they found acceptable to the people.

V. 10. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21. Ezra i. 1. vi. 6-15. Dan. ix. 1. Zech. i. 12, 13.) 'But few, in comparison of these, returned in person into their own country: so this promise was chiefly fulfilled to their posterity; and it is common in Scripture to speak of blessings bestowed upon the children, as if they had actually been made good to their progenitors.' (Louth.)

V. 11-14. The Lord had his plan before him, and neither the impatience of the Jews, nor the power of the Chaldeans could alter it. He had determined, that the Chaldean monarchy should continue till the seventy years expired, and so long the Jews must remain in captivity. But he had thoughts of peace and not of evil to those who were already at Babylon: (Notes, xxiv.) Their calamities were intended for their good, and he would in due time give them that happy deliverance which they expected, or an end, even their hope. Other benefits, personal or public, spiritual or temporal, they might in the mean time obtain by prayer; and they might pray to be delivered in the appointed season: but when it arrived, the Lord would pour upon them the Spirit of grace and supplication, and lead them to fervent prayer, and great earnestness, by every means to seek his favour; and they would do it with their whole heart, and succeed, and then their captivity would be terminated. By consulting the marginal references, the reader will see, that the termination of the judgments brought on the nation by their sins, in answer to their penitent fervent prayers, had been pointed out by Moses and the prophets; and the same is foretold by Zecariah, as the introduction to the restoration of the Jews from their present dispersions, (which some think to be here predicted, as well as their return from Babylon.) (Note, Zech. xii. 10-14.)

V. 15. 'As Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah.' (21. 25.)

16 Know that thus saith the LORD, of the king that sitteth upon the throne of David, and of all the people that dwelleth in this city, and of your brethren that are not gone forth with you into captivity ;

17 Thus saith the LORD of hosts ; Behold, I will send upon them the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, and will make them like vile figs, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil

18 And I will persecute them with the sword, with the famine, and with the pestilence, and will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth, * to be a curse, and an astonishment, and an hissing, and a reproach, among all the nations, whither I have driven them :

19 Because they have not hearkened to my words, saith the LORD, which I sent unto them by my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them ; but ye would not hear, saith the LORD.

20 Hear ye therefore the word of the LORD, all ye of the captivity, whom I have sent from Jerusalem to Babylon :

21 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, of Ahab the son of Koliah, and of Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, which prophesy a lie unto you in my name ; Behold, I will deliver them into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon ; and he shall slay them before your eyes ;

22 And of them * shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The LORD make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Judah roasted in the fire ;

23 Because they have committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives, and have spoken lying words in my name, which I have not commanded them ; * even I know, and am a witness, saith the LORD.

24 ¶ Thus shalt thou also speak to Shemaiah the † Nebelamite, saying,

25 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, Because thou hast sent letters in thy name unto all the people that are at Jerusalem, and to Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, and to all the priests, saying,

26 The LORD hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest, that ye should be officers in the house of the LORD, for every man that is mad, and maketh himself a prophet, that thou shouldest put him in prison, and in the stocks.

27 Now therefore why hast thou not reproved Jeremiah of Anathoth, which maketh himself a prophet to you ?

28 For therefore he sent us in Babylon, saying, This captivity is long : build ye houses, and dwell in them ; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them.

29 And Zephaniah the priest read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah the prophet.

30 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying,

31 Send to all them of the captivity, saying, Thus saith the LORD concerning Shemaiah the Nebelamite ; Because that Shemaiah hath prophesied unto you, and I sent him not, and he caused you to trust in a lie ;

32 Therefore thus saith the LORD ; Behold, I will punish Shemaiah the Nebelamite, and his seed : * he shall not have a man to dwell among this people ; neither shall he behold the good that I will do for my people, saith the LORD ;

V. 16-20. (Note, xxiv. 3-10. Marg. Ref.) The Septuagint omits these verses, and connects the fifteenth with the twenty first.

V. 21-23. It is probable that these false prophets excited the people to make disturbances, or at least to be disaffected to the government ; and this so offended Nebuchadrezzar, that he put them to death in a most cruel manner, to deter others from such seditious practices. For it pleased God to deliver them into his hand, that he might punish them for their atrocious wickedness, as well as for their lying predictions. It seems that the people did not know of their villany and adulteries, till the Lord testified against them, and by exposing their secret crimes put men on their guard against their seductions. The accomplishment of this dreadful prediction would have a great effect upon the minds of the Jews ; and when they were enraged against any one, they would not be able to think of a more dreadful imprecation, than to wish them like Ahab and Zedekiah. The event seems to have confirmed Jeremiah's predictions, that the captives were taken off from hearkening to false prophets, and rendered more quiet in their situation.

CHAP. XXX.

Prophecies of the restoration of the Jews, and the rebuilding of their city and temple; notwithstanding their extreme calamities, the justice of their punishment, the failure of all human help, and their own desponding thoughts, 1—18: of their subsequent increase and prosperity under their own rulers; and of the destruction of their enemies and the wicked, 19—21.

V. 24—32. Shemaiah seems to have written back by Zedekiah's messengers. The word Nehelamite signifies a dreamer. Jeremiah had been a prophet for a long course of years: so that even the captivity of Jeconiah and the Jews had been repeatedly and expressly predicted by him: yet Shemaiah, (pretending to be a prophet) thought himself authorized to treat him with the most decided contempt: and by a circular letter, in his own name, and not in that of the elders of the people, and directed to the priests and people at Jerusalem, he excited them to silence and punish him! His letter was particularly addressed to Zephaniah, who had succeeded Jehoiada, in superintending the affairs of the temple. Zephaniah is elsewhere called "the second priest,"³³ under Seraiah the high priest, (iii. 24.) who, some think, was also called Jehoiada. Shemaiah thought that Zephaniah neglected his duty, in not calling Jeremiah to a severe account for his predictions, which seemed to him one great end of his advancement. Jeremiah had long been owned of God, as his appointed prophet, and Shemaiah ran without being sent; yet he charged Jeremiah with making himself a prophet, probably because the chief priests generally opposed him. And though his predictions coincided with the whole tenour of their Scriptures, yet he wanted to have him confined as a mad man, and severely punished; because he would not blatter his wicked countrymen with the hopes of prosperity! Zephaniah seems not to have regarded the letter, and perhaps was favourably disposed to Jeremiah; (xxi. 1.) But the Lord ordered his prophet to denounce the doom of Shemaiah and of his family: and doubtless he took the first opportunity of transmitting the sentence to him. "He and his seed shall be destroyed, so that none of them shall see the benefit of this deliverance."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The zealous servant of God considers himself as bound to use every means in his power to profit those who are far off, as well as those that are near. Writing is peculiarly profitable in this respect; and it is rendered immensely more beneficial by the invention of printing, in circulating the knowledge of the word of God. Alas, that these useful discoveries should be so generally abused to contrary purposes! Submission to Providence is always our duty and interest; and it is as foolish as it is ungrateful, to undervalue and reject the comforts within our reach, by repining for the want of those which we cannot obtain. The interests of the Church, or of posterity, should by no means be neglected, because we may not live to witness or share them. Wherever our lot is cast, we ought to approve ourselves peaceable members of the community, even though subjected to hardship and oppression: considering our situation and its disadvantages as the appointment of God; and assured that good behaviour will render it more tolerable than turbulence and faction; it is our duty to pray for the peace of the country in which we reside, and the welfare of those rulers who afford us any measure of protection: and if this was the duty of the Jews at Babylon, and of the Christians under Nero, it must be that of all the people of God in every age and place. Christians should therefore exceedingly fear being seduced into factious measures, which are contrary to Scripture and disgraceful to the Gospel. And as no pre- intimations are given us of those great revolutions, by which power passes from one to another; and which are generally effected by those in public situations, or by popular assemblies; it behoves us in our private stations to study to be quiet, and to mind our own business. The promises of God will certainly be performed in their appointed season; but that must be waited for, in the use of authorized means alone. We know not what the thoughts of God are, respecting our personal concerns, and he hath put the times and seasons in his own power; but it should suffice us to know, in general, that he hath thoughts of good, and not of evil, towards his Church, which shall at length have an expected end of its long continued oppression; and that all things shall work together for the believer's good till his trials are ended, and his most enlarged hopes are vastly exceeded in the rest and felicity of heaven. In general, we are assured that all who seek the Lord, and call upon him, and search for him with their whole hearts, shall find him, and be made joyful in his salvation: and that the Lord introduces great revivals of religion, by exciting his people to fervent prayers and supplications. Thus they go forth to meet him, when he comes to perform his promises: and thus let us seek for that prevalence of the Gospel, which he hath taught us to expect.

V. 15—32.

Let all beware how they call those teachers, "whom they heap to themselves after their own lusts," prophets whom the Lord has raised up unto them; or those dreams, which they cause to be dreamed coincident with their inclinations, revelations from God. The mistake is often fatal: and the teacher and his message should be carefully compared with the Scriptures, and the nature, tendency, and effects of them, well weighed. The Lord is immutable in his purposes and will surely be true to his word, both in punishing impenitent sinners, and in saving all who obey his Gospel: and it is vain to attempt new modelling religion, by leaving out alarming and offensive truths, in order to render it more palatable to the vitiated minds of sinners. In this way men deceive themselves, and are deceived by Satan transformed into an angel of light; and then they are employed as his ministers transformed into ministers of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works. For the heart-searching God often beholds much villainy in those who teach a smooth and deceitful gospel; they frequently have their secret reasons for encouraging men to indulge their lusts; otherwise what hope could they themselves have of escaping the damnation of hell? And it is an unspeakable mercy to numbers, when the crimes of such deceivers are detected, to prevent the pernicious effects of their licentious or skeptical tenets: but if they continue impenitent, they will at length become the most miserable and execrated of mankind. It should never be forgotten, that they who are evidently walking in the broad road, are altogether improper persons to teach others the way to heaven. Yet men of this character commonly treat the servants of God with peculiar rage or scorn: they are officious and intermeddling, and often instigate their superiors to persecute, when they have it not in their own power. Many of them think that authority, especially ecclesiastical authority, is chiefly useful in enabling those who possess it to silence and punish the laborious ministers, whose preaching detects their hypocrisy, and whose example shames their sloth and avarice: they make loud outcries that the Church is betrayed by its rulers, when the ministers of God are unmolested. In their judgment the zealous active preacher is a madman, or a fool, or worse: let who will be tolerated, he ought to be disgraced and silenced; and a prison and the stocks are his just desert. It is happy for mankind, that men of this stamp generally want power adequate to their malice; and that those of greater moderation have the management of such affairs. All the accusations brought against many laborious teachers of modern times, when fairly examined, amount to no more than this; they earnestly counsel men to attend to their true interests and present duties, and not to expect impunity in sin, or in neglect of God's salvation; but to wait for the performance of his promises in his appointed way, and in obedience to his commandments; and these words of truth and soberness are called madness and enthusiasm, by numbers who scarcely ever looked into the word of God! They who are thus inveterate against the truth, and those who preach it, will not behold the good that the Lord will do unto his people; but will be punished according as they have taught rebellion against him.

NOTES.
 CHAP. XXX. V. 2, 3. This and some of the following chapters contain predictions as encouraging as the preceding chapters were alarming. The prophet was ordered to write in a book, for the use of posterity, "all the words that the LORD had spoken to him." This seems to refer to the whole of his prophecies, and not to this particular message; and it is supposed that an abstract of all his predictions has been transmitted to us. JEHOVAH intended to restore the Jews to their own land, and to continue his worship among them: and the whole of Jeremiah's predictions would be of great use to them. As his contemporaries had almost universally neglected his warnings and exhortations, the prophet might be tempted to conclude that his labours were in vain: but this was by no means the case; for his writings would convince, lead to repentance, and encourage the Jews, during their captivity; at the approach of their deliverance, they would direct their measures, and put energy into their prayers; and after that event, they would tend to establish successive generations in the worship of God, who had predicted and effected all these surprising events: they would excite their praises to him for performing his promises, warn them against idolatry and iniquity, and animate them to obedience. Nay, this weeping prophet (who seems a peculiar instance of one every way fitted for usefulness, labouring for years with very little visible success.) has been made abundantly useful to the Church of God, for above two thousand years already, and will continue to be so to the end of the world.

ing their Church and state, or even of rendering their bondage more gentle. All the nations, whose alliance they had courted, whose idolatries they had copied, and who professed great love to them, had forgotten them, and desired no further acquaintance with them. JEHOVAH himself seemed to fight against them as an enemy: his chastisement was very severe, and like that of a cruel one; for he had been provoked to it by their multiplied iniquities. It was therefore in vain for them to lament their miseries, or complain of hard usage: their sorrow was incurable by any other hand than that which had inflicted it; and in order to obtain that, they must submit to him, and acknowledge his justice in their punishment. Nevertheless, though they suffered justly, and could not help themselves, yet he intended to appear for them, and to retaliate on those who had devoured them and carried them captive; he would bind up and heal the wounds, of which the nation lay as it were expiring: and because the heathen insulted over the Jews as outcasts, and Zion as deserted and disregarded, he promised, in mercy to the people, to cause their habitations throughout the land to be re-built, as well as the city, upon its old foundation, which during the captivity was a heap of ruins; and that the temple should be restored, and remain, after the ancient manner, the centre of their worship, and the place of their solemn feasts and sacrifices.

V. 19—22. After the captivity the Jews should have abundant cause for joy and thanksgiving: for the Lord promised that he would exceedingly multiply and prosper them: their posterity should be taken care of, as the children of the covenant, in the same manner as they had been in former ages; the whole nation should be established as his congregation; and their oppressors should be severely punished. They would also be governed by magistrates of their own nation, and not of the Gentiles, as during the captivity; and even their chief governor would be raised up from among themselves: the Lord would cause him to draw near unto him, to inquire his will, and present his appointed worship; for who, (except thus taught, and drawn of God,) had ever engaged his heart, to approach unto the Lord? Thus they would become the Lord's people, and he would again be known as their God.—This prophecy was accomplished in some measure by the Vol. III.—No. 20.

increase and prosperity of the Jews in their own land, under the government of several rulers of their own nation, who for a long time were the high priests, that by office drew near before God, even into the most holy place, as the typical intercessors for the people whom they governed. Yet the Jews were seldom, if ever, free from dependence on strangers, and were frequently oppressed by them after the captivity; and many of their rulers were far from meriting the character here given. But when Christ arose, and was advanced to the mediatorial throne, as High Priest and King in one person, and in this character drew near before God, in behalf of his people, having engaged his heart to pass through all his previous sufferings as their all-atonement sacrifice, this prediction had its full accomplishment. And who is this, that engages his heart to undertake so arduous a service? Who is this, that ventures to intercede for sinners before a just and holy God? Is he not the Son of God and the Lord of glory, in whom the Father is well pleased, and whom all the angels of God worship? And, through him, all that believe become the people of God, and he becomes their Portion and Salvation.

Nobles. 'The Hebrew word is singular, and literally signifies their mighty One; a title given to God himself.—They shall no more be governed by strangers, but shall have a ruler of their own nation; such was Zerubbabel, a figure of Christ. He shall have a near attendance on me: for I will make him a Priest as well as a King, according to the prophecy concerning the Messias, "Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek."—"For who is there but the Messias, that is so entirely devoted to my service?—The words have an emphasis in the original, that cannot be translated, and are spoken by way of admiration.—(Lowth.)—Let it be remembered, that Zerubbabel was neither priest nor king, though ruler of the Jews under the kings of Persia.

V. 23, 24. (Note, xxxii. 19, 20.) These verses may be understood of those enemies of the Jews who attempted to hinder their return to their own land; or who afterwards molested or oppressed them: in this sense, they were fulfilled in the subversion of the Babylonish empire; and in the slaughter of those who sought the destruction of the Jews in the days of Esther and Mordecai: and afterwards in the ruin of Antiochus Epiphanes, and those who concurred in his cruel persecutions. But if we explain the preceding verses of Christ and his kingdom, these, most naturally and consistently with the context, refer to the unbelieving Jews themselves, and to the terrible ruin that came on them, for wickedly rejecting and crucifying Christ, and opposing the setting up of his kingdom. These judgments came from the fierce anger of the Lord, and the effects of them continue to this day; and in the latter days the Jewish nation will consider the rejection of that Governor, that proceeded from themselves, as the cause of all their miseries.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The discoveries which God hath made of his truth and will, have been carefully registered and preserved, for the benefit of future generations: and he speaks to us by the writings of his ancient servants, as plainly as he did to their contemporaries by their mouths: let us then value, and study with humble diligence and obedient faith, these sacred records. They who simply serve God, and are zealous for his glory, will in one way or other be useful to their fellow sinners: some of his ministers are most useful during their lives by their preaching; and others speak most effectually after their death by their writings: but "as every man hath received the gift, so let him minister, as a good steward of the manifold grace of God:" and "let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." Sin leads to terror and dismay: they who will not tremble at the word of God, must tremble at his judgments: obstinate transgressors will bear a voice of terror, and not of peace: and if temporal calamities dismay and distress the stoutest and most intrepid, what will be the wrath to come? Afflictions in this world often prove the means of good, and are never entirely without hope; but future punishment will be unmingled hopeless misery. Deep convictions of sin and terrors of conscience, attended with sore temptations and afflictions, often cause a time of trouble so great, that the awakened sinner has never before known any thing like it: but it proves a happy crisis, when attended with "that godly sorrow which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of;" and in due time he shall be saved out of it. For our gracious God will pardon his sins, speak peace to his conscience, and break off the yoke of sin and Satan; that, "being delivered from all his enemies," he may serve him without fear, in righteousness and "true holiness before him," all the remnant of his days, as the redeemed subject of Christ our King, whom the Father hath raised up unto us. The believer also may have blessings to Judah and Israel as connected with the birth of Christ, 21—23. Every man shall answer for his own sins only, 29, 30. A new and better covenant promised, 31—34. The stability of God's favour to Israel, 35—37. The rebuilding and extent of Jerusalem foretold, 38—40.

days of great affliction and temptations, and even of terror and dismay; but he shall be saved from them all: and even death, which is such a time of trouble as can but once be experienced, will be to him a season of complete deliverance, and an introduction to "the joy of his Lord." Let then none who serve God fear or be dismayed on his own account, or on that of the Church; for victory and triumph await them. Believers shall be gathered from afar, and return from all their dispersions; and faith, with submission to God, will give them rest and quietness here on earth, and none shall durably make them afraid. He will be with them to save them; though he correct them, it shall be in measure, and for their good; and he will not make a full end of them, as of the wicked around them. Yet the wounds and bruises which he sometimes inflicts, seem very grievous, and are incurable by any hand but his. Every effort to heal ourselves must needs prove fruitless; for we have none to plead our cause, that we may be bound up, nor any healing medicines, whilst we neglect the heavenly Advocate and the sanctifying Spirit. All earthly comforts and comforters will soon fail us. When we consider the number and heinousness of our sins, we may be ready to consider God himself as our irreconcilable enemy, and every chastisement as the wound of a cruel one; and so long as we only repine at our affliction, our sorrows remain incurable. But when we are thus driven from every false refuge, and led to acknowledge that God is just in all he inflicts or threatens; the alarming and painful discovery is a preparation for peace and comfort. Thus we are brought to submit to his righteousness and accept of his mercy. Then he rebukes our enemies, and rescues us from the jaws of the devourer: he binds up the broken heart, and cures the sin-distempered soul; and he will complete the salvation that hath been so happily begun. The dealings of his grace, with every true convert and every returning backslider, are exactly the same, upon a smaller scale, as his dealings with the Jews. And in the same manner he corrects, humbles, pardons, heals, and restores offending Churches from age to age: for the Redeemer of Israel is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

V. 19—24.

Our God will certainly comfort all those who penitently turn unto him: he will give them abundant blessings and a thankful heart: and when he increases and glorifies his Church, all, who sympathized in its sorrows and prayed for its prosperity, will rejoice and be thankful. It is a great mercy to nations to be ruled by prudent princes and magistrates, who are "of themselves," and have their welfare at heart: but still more so to be governed by those whom the Lord causes to draw near unto him, as his accepted servants and worshippers.—

 They who approach him, must have their hearts engaged to do it in reverence, devotion, and faith: but who of our sinful race could thus have ventured to approach the holy God, who is a consuming fire to all the workers of inquity; if Christ our King and High Priest had not engaged to atone for our sins, and were not entered into the true sanctuary, to appear in his presence on our behalf?
 Through him we find acceptance, and access with boldness to the throne of grace, become his people, and have the Lord for our God. How then will they escape who neglect so great salvation? “For behold, the whirlwind of the Lord still goeth forth with fury, and his continual indignation will fall with pain on the head of the wicked;”
 nor “will it return, till he hath performed the intents of his heart,” in the destruction of all those who obey not the Gospel of his Son. May we consider seriously these declarations, and the doom of former enemies of the Gospel: may we duly attend to these things, before those latter days come, when consideration will only increase the anguish of all who have perished without remedy.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. This is a continuation of the prophecy that was begun in the preceding chapter, which evidently relates to the kingdom of Christ. The same time, therefore, here mentioned, must refer to those events, and to the latter days of the Church. Not only would the Jews be reinstated in their privileges as the people of God; but the same blessing is promised to all the families of Israel. (Note, xxx. 2, 3.) Some Israelites returned with the Jews from Babylon, and perhaps more of them were incorporated among them in the several places where they settled; and many of them were converted to Christianity in the primitive ages: yet these things seem to have formed only a partial accomplishment of this prediction. But “in the latter days,” when the Jews “shall be turned to the Lord, all Israel shall be saved,” (Rom.
 xi. 26.) and then JEHOVAH will emphatically be the God of all the families of Israel: and when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in, even those of Israel, that are inseparably incorporated with them, will find admission into the Church. Several parts in this prophecy seem to look forward thus far: yet various previous events are noticed in the course of it, as introductory to its grand completion.

 V. 2. The Israelites who had escaped the murdering sword of Pharaoh, and the hostile attempts of the Amalekites and other enemies, were marvellously preserved and favoured by JEHOVAH in the wilderness; and, notwithstanding their rebellions and chastisements, they were at length put in possession of Canaan, and there established, increased, and prospered, because God went with them, to give them the rest and inheritance which he had promised to their fathers. In like manner the remnant, that escaped the sword of the Chaldeans, would find favour with God, and be re-established in their own land. And after the still more terrible havoc made of them by the Romans, and in their consequent dispersions, similar favours were intended them.

V. 3-5. Israel is here introduced, recollecting how God in times of old had made himself known to their fathers, and appeared for their deliverance, with a silent regret that he now seemed to forsake them. To this the Lord answers, (for saying is not in the original,) that “truly he had loved them with an everlasting love:”
 from the beginning he had peculiarly favoured the nation, and he would continue thus to favour them to the end; his purposes of love had been from everlasting, and the effects of them would be to everlasting: his loving kindness had drawn them into a special relation to him; and it would yet prevail to bring them again into possession of their privileges, and to re-establish them in prosperity. The nation was considered as a virgin that had been betrothed to him: and instead of mourning as she had done, like one that was deserted and desolate, she should be adorned with festive garments, and express her gladness of heart by such tokens, as young persons employed on joyful occasions.
 (Marg. Ref.) They would also again possess their own land, at least some part of it, and there plant vineyards which would yield a great increase. Some of the Israelites, who at different periods returned with the Jews from captivity, doubtless got possession of their ancient inheri-tances; but probably this refers to events yet future; or is spoken figuratively.—The word rendered, “shall eat them as common things,” literally signifies, shall profane them.
 —It alludes to the law that forbade the fruit of any young trees to be eaten, till the fifth year, (Lev. xix. 23-25.)
 —when the fruit was—common for every one to eat.

V. 15—17. The original name of Rachel is exactly the same as in Genesis; though in our bibles it is generally printed Rahel. As this in some degree perplexes many readers, Rachel is substituted in the text, as well as in the notes. Rachel was mother to Joseph and Benjamin: from the former descended a large proportion of the kingdom of Israel, and from the other numbers of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The desolations of Israel and Judah made vast havoc among her descendants. The sepulchre of Rachel was betwixt Ramah and Bethlehem: and she is here poetically introduced as weeping for her children with bitter and inconsolable lamentation, as if her posterity had been utterly extirpated. It will hereafter be considered in what sense the murder of the children in the coats of Bethlehem accomplished this prediction. (Notes, Matt. ii. 17, 18.) To carry on the allusion, the Lord here addresses her, and calls on her to refrain from weeping, for her labour in bringing up her children should not be lost, or be without recompense; as those that were left, and scattered among their enemies, would come again to their own land; and she might hope for great blessings for them in the latter days.

V. 18—20. All the blessings predicted to Israel, implied that he would be brought to repentance. This is here more particularly described, in the person of Ephraim, as representing the nation. The Lord heard him under his afflictions, bemoaning himself with penitent confessions and prayers. He looks back, and recollects with grief and shame, that the Lord had chastised him, and that he had suffered without deriving benefit; or at length he had received instruction, though he had long been refractory and rebellious, as headstrong bullocks, not inured to the yoke, which struggle against the driver, and will not submit.— Conscious that this is the nature of his proud stout heart, and that it must be humbled, softened, and converted; and that he cannot effect this change by his own power; he believes that God can, hopes that he will, and prays that he would, "turn him, that he may be turned." He acknowledges, that the Lord has a right to his obedience and service, and that he stands in a peculiar relation to him, and he desires to have him for his God and Portion. Some little of this gracious turning he experiences; he had begun to repent of his sins: and since he had been instructed in the things of God, he was sensible of his guilt and danger, and was full of self-indignation and abhorrence, to think how rebellious and ungrateful he had been; which astonishment and self-displacement he expressed by smiting on his thigh. He was grieved and confounded to find that he lay under a heavy load of deserved ignominy and reproach, for the sins that he had been committing from his youth, which deserved more than all the contempt and misery that he lay under. The Lord seeing Ephraim, like the prodigal son, thus "come to himself," and overwhelmed with sorrow and shame, speaks of him with the tenderest affection. Could this poor distressed mourner be Ephraim, his dear son, his child in whom he had so delighted? And was he at length returned home again? Let him not be upbraided with his offences, of which he so deeply repented; but let him be re-admitted to all the privileges of a child, without limitation or delay. For ever since that the Lord denounced sentence against him, or addressed him with cutting rebukes, he had remembered him with tender compassion, and earnest longings after him; as an affectionate parent doth his son, whom he is obliged to correct. His eye was upon him through all his wanderings, waiting to be gracious; and as he was now truly penitent, and supplicated mercy, he would surely extend it to him. "Do thou turn my heart ' by thy preventing grace, and thus I shall be effectually ' reformed. As soon as God's grace touched my heart, ' and gave me a due sense of my duty, and the many ' deviations from it I had been guilty of, I straightway ' became a true penitent; and expressed my repentance by ' all the outward and inward signs of an unfeigned sorrow. ' — The burden of my former sins lay heavy on my mind; ' and I became sensible, that all the calamities and re-proaches I had undergone were the due desert of mine offences.' (Louth.)—This is a most destructive and encouraging representation of the nature and effects of true repentance; and its prophetic meaning may either relate to the conversion of Israelites to Christianity in the primitive times, or to events yet in futurity.

V. 21, 22. The dispersed Jews and Israelites are here called on to return without delay to their deserted cities, and to set up way-marks, or to throw up heaps to direct inquirers in the road. Let them heartily attempt to go back to their own land, by the way in which they had gone from it, and no longer wander about as they had done; like a woman who had improperly left her father's house, and was afraid or ashamed, or reluctant to return. To encourage them to this, the Lord assures them, that "he had created," or would create, "a new thing in the earth." It would be a new thing, altogether unprecedented, and worthy to be called a creation; for "A woman should compass a man," or a Mighty one, a great Deliverer. Now what can this more properly mean, than that a virgin, continuing so, should conceive and compass in her womb, and bear a son, who would be "that Seed of the woman, who was appointed to bruise the serpent's head; even EMMANUEL, God with us?" This was effected by the immediate power of God, contrary to the established course of nature: it was a new thing, both as to his miraculous conception and his mysterious person; and it was adduced with great propriety for the encouragement of the Jews to return to that land, where this promised Deliverer was to arise.—As it is a new thing, and unheard of, that a woman should court a man; so God will bring as strange a thing to pass, that the Jewish nation shall return to God, their Husband. So most of the modern Jews, and some of the Christian expositors, understand the words: A woman, that is, the most feeble despicable persons, compared elsewhere to women, should discount a mighty warrior.' (Louth.) These are the most plausible interpretations given of the passage, by those who reject that which is stated above. But the narrative of Potiphar's wife, and that of Jael and Sisera, and very many others, suffice to show, that neither of these were new things on earth: and surely the solemnity of the introduction, and the term create, appear on either interpretation, to have little propriety or meaning. 'One that is only a woman, and not a wife, namely, a virgin, shall conceive in her womb a man-child, (Rev. xii. 5.) This is truly a new thing, never before related or heard of: without which satisfaction could not be obtained by the weary soul, nor the new covenant be established, (31—34.) By this the backsliding daughter, namely, the nation of the Jews, which was turned away from God, ought to be so influenced as no longer to wander about, at a distance from him.' (Coereus.) It is observable, that the other predictions of the miraculous conception are conveyed in an obscure manner, and have caused much difficulty to expositors, (Notes, Gen. iii. 15. Is. vii. 14.) and it seems exceedingly proper, that the clear and express declaration of such an event should be subsequent to its having actually taken place.—Several ancient Jews expounded the text of the Messias.—And most Christian interpreters understand it of the miraculous conception.—Taking the words in this sense, they properly import a new creation, and such as is the immediate work of God. The coming of the Messias is the foundation of all the promises, both of the first and second covenant: and that covenant, of which Christ was to be the Mediator, is plainly foretold and described.' (31—34.) (Louth.)

V. 23—26. After the desolations of Judah, Jerusalem, and the temple, which had been called the habitation of justice and the mountain of holiness, prayers for their prosperity were discouraged: but the suspension would be taken off by the restoration of them; and then such expressions of good-will to Zion would be frequent and fervent. For the Lord had purposed to satisfy and comfort every one, who was wearied with trials and sorry for his sins, or who sympathized in the sorrows of his afflicted people; and the outward blessings, to which he meant to restore them, would be typical of the spiritual prosperity of the gospel-church. This seems to have been presented before the prophet's mind in a dream or vision: and when he awaked and considered it, he was refreshed with the pleasing prospect, so contrary to the visions that he had generally seen.—Having seen this vision of the Messiah to come, in whom the two houses of Israel and Judah should be joined, I rejoiced.

CHAP. XXXII.

Jeremiah imprisoned for predicting the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of the Jewish people, 1—5. He buys a field by the command of God, as a token that the Jews should be restored to their inheri-tances, 6—15. He prays to be further certified concerning these transactions, 16—25. He is informed of the approaching calamities for the sins of the people, 26—35; and encouraged by promises of spiritual and temporal blessings, 36—44.

shore, till the utmost coasts of the earth are made acquainted, with the joyful sound: nor should we forget to join our prayers with our endeavours, that the Lord may save his people, even the remnant of Israel. When his time arrives, his power and grace can readily remove all obstacles, rectify all obliquities, and remedy all defects: he can give eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, strength to the weak, support to the heavy laden, and rest to the weary soul; and thus bring great companies into his Church. When he effectually draws sinners to come to him, their hard hearts soon melt and soften; and they, who once were too proud and stout to attend to such duties, and who derided those that did, learn to mourn for sin and cry for mercy. Then he will lead them in his ways, supply their wants, refresh and comfort their hearts, uphold them from falling, and be a Father unto them, and they shall be his children and his heirs. It shall be known even to the isles afar off, that he careth for his chosen people: and if he suffer them to be scattered, he will gather and keep them, as a shepherd doth his flock: by price and by power he hath ransomed and redeemed them from those enemies that were stronger than they; and he will maintain and perfect their deliverance, and not let any pluck them out of his hand. To his courts they flow together, to share and to celebrate his goodness: and whilst he supplies all their outward wants, their souls shall be cheerful and fruitful as a watered garden. Their sorrows shall terminate in joy; and their comforts are earnest of eternal felicity in that world, where they shall not sorrow any more at all, but both ministers and people shall be satisfied with the goodness of the Lord.

V. 15—30.

Whilst the believer hath "a joy that a stranger intermeddleth not with;" he must in the world expect tribulations: and a voice of lamentation often interrupts that of thanksgiving, even in the dwellings of the righteous. But if bereaving providences, or other afflictions, cause the Christian such bitter mourning, that he refuses to be comforted, it must be considered as his infirmity. We should not mourn over our children and relatives, as if they were not, when they are removed from us: but, having used the proper means for promoting their future felicity, we should leave them with our righteous and merciful God. He graciously comforts those that are cast down, and bids his mourners dry their tears; for both their sorrows and labours shall be recompensed: and if we have hope in our end for ourselves and those belonging to us, concerning an eternal inheritance, all temporal afflictions will be tolerable. —The true penitent reflects with shame and contrition on his former obstinacy and rebellion, and on his misconduct under afflictions, as well as his abuse of mercies: he knows that he hath often suffered in vain, and hath been as un-tractable as the "bullock unaccustomed to the yoke." Once he excused his sins; but now he is sensible of his ingratitude and folly: he is convinced that he must be made a new creature, in order to serve God and enjoy his favour; he feels the power of inbred sin, evil habits, and strong temptations, and perceives that he cannot new-create his own heart: thus he learns to value the promises of sanctifying grace, and to plead them in prayer, crying to the Lord, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;" "Convert me, or I shall never be converted." His prayers will be answered, he will be more and more abased and humbled; and increasing instruction will lead him to abhor himself, and to remember with shame the sins that were the reproach of his youth, and the effects of which he hath perhaps still to struggle with. This may, or may not, be accompanied with terror: but it will surely be attended with submission to the justice of God in all his corrections and threatenings, an entire reliance on his mercy and grace, and newness of life. Where this change is effected, (whether in the case of a new convert, or of a returning backslider,) the Lord will treat him as a beloved child in whom he greatly delighteth, and "will surely have mercy "on him;" he will pity his sorrows and terrors, as a father doth those of his son whom he loveth and correcteth; and will remember him with the most tender compassions. He is of his own clemency disposed to this kindness; and in that new thing, that he hath created on earth, in the Virgin's Son, the glorious Prince of Peace, the great Emmanuel, he hath made way for the honourable exercise of his mercy to the chief of sinners. Let then poor prodigals, who are come to themselves, no longer wander about, as ashamed or afraid to return to their Father's house: let them set their hearts to the highway which he hath cast up; let them "return to the Lord," and he will have mercy on them; and then let them direct and encourage others in the same salutary course. Thus men return to Zion, and are enrolled her citizens; and all who profess to worship our God in Christ, and on his mercy-seat, should remember that his Church is "the habitation of righteousness and the mountain of holiness:" as such, they should still pray for her prosperity, and that they may be a credit and ornament to her by their holy examples. He hath yet a remnant both of pastors and of flocks, who answer this description; and he still continues to satiate the weary, and replenish the sorrowful soul. Having tasted his grace, hoping for his glory, and looking forward to the happy event of all our troubles and those of the whole family of Christ, our thoughts even in death may be pleasant, by reflecting on what we shall shortly awake to behold and enjoy. For the Lord will still watch over his people and purify his Church. No man shall finally perish, but for his own sins; nor any sinner, who is willing to accept of Christ's salvation.

Blessed be God for his new covenant, and for that new dispensation under which we live! But let us not trust to the outward administration of it, which will stand us in no more stead than the Sinai-covenant did Israel, except the law be written in our hearts, as the principle of genuine repentance, faith, and cheerful obedience. This alone can prove that we are the true people of God: and that we know the Father and the Son, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and that all our sins are blotted out, to be remembered no more for ever. This circumcision and regeneration of the heart seals to the Christian the righteousness of faith, and evidences that he is Christ's, and has peace with God through him: and the power that formed the heavenly orbs, and continues them for lights to the earth, and that divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar, will keep him through faith unto salvation. The personal happiness of every true believer is secured by that promise, covenant, and oath, which assure us that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church. This his love is immeasurable, and passeth knowledge; it can only be apprehended by faith and experience: and to those who thus apprehend

CHAP. XXXII. V. 2. Jeremiah was confined, to prevent his publicly delivering his predictions: but it does not appear that he was put to further hardship at this time, or that his friends were excluded from him. Zedekiah and his princes were desperately resolved to hold out to the last extremity, not only against the superior power of the Chaldeans, but in defiance of the word of God: and Jeremiah must be silenced, or he would discourage the people by his predictions.

19 Great in counsel, and mighty in work : for thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men : to give every one according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings :

V. 6—15. The prophet was assured that the city and temple would soon be levelled with the ground ; and all the rest of the land was at that time in the possession of the Chaldeans : yet the Lord made it known to him, that his cousin would come to him to sell him a field ; and as he was the next in succession, to whom the right of redemption belonged, he commanded him to purchase it. Accordingly Hanameel came on this business, During the famine that prevailed in the city, he probably wanted money to buy bread, and his field would not be thought of much value in such circumstances ; which may account for the stipulated sum being so small, for probably it was not more than forty shillings. It does not concern us to inquire, whether this land were a part of the possessions of the priests, in the suburbs of Anathoth, or some other small estate in the neighbourhood, that had come into the family : for the thing signified, not the sign, was chiefly to be noticed. The prophet himself was not likely to have any advantage from the field, nor any relation that was nearer to him than Hanameel himself ; and it might be very inconvenient to him to part even with so small a sum, in his difficult circumstances : but he knew that it was the word of the LORD, and implicitly obeyed it. By remaining unmarried, (xvi.) he assured the people, that he was satisfied of the truth of his predictions respecting the captivity ; and by thus buying the field he proved the same, as to his predictions of their restoration. The transaction being settled,

20 Which hast set signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, even unto this day, and in Israel, and among other men ; and hast made thee a name, as at this day ;

21 And hast brought forth thy people Israel out of the land of Egypt, with signs, and with wonders, and with a strong hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with great terror ;

22 And hast given them this land, which thou didst swear to their fathers to give them, a land flowing with milk and honey ;

23 And they came in, and possessed it, but they obeyed not thy voice, neither walked in thy law ; they have done nothing of all that thou commandedst them to do : therefore thou hast caused all this evil to come upon them.

24 Behold the mountains, they are come unto the city to take it ; and the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans that fight against it, because of the sword, and of the famine, and of the pestilence : and what thou hast spoken is come to pass : and behold, thou seest it.

according to the law and custom of the time, with great punctuality, would give it notoriety : and his orders to his companion Baruch to put the deeds into an earthen vessel, (an apt emblem of the precariousness of such possessions,) and to secure them in some place where they might be found at the end of many days, would cause the annexed reason to be the more noticed and remembered.

V. 17. Hard, &c. Or 'hidden from thee, out of the reach of thy wisdom to compass.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.) The original more generally "signifies wonderful." Nothing of any kind is hidden from thee, or is too hard for thee, and therefore appears to thee wonderful. (Gen. xviii. 14. Judg. xiii. 13. Marg. Is. ix. 6.) The prophet seems to have been greatly surprised, at comparing the command just given with the dispensations of Providence. The whole appeared wonderful to him : but he knew that it was not so before God ; because "known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world ;" and "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." This therefore seems to have implied a petition for some further satisfaction on the subject.

25 And thou hast said unto me, O Lord God, Buy thee the field for money, and take witnesses; * for the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans.

26 ¶ Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying,

27 Behold, I am the LORD, * the God of all flesh: ¹ is there any thing too hard for me?

28 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the Chaldeans, and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and he shall take it.

29 And the Chaldeans, that fight against this city, shall come and * set fire on this city, and burn it, with the houses, ² upon whose roofs they have offered incense unto Baal, and poured out drink-offerings unto other gods, to provoke me to anger.

30 For ³ the children of Israel, and the children of Judah have only done evil before me from their youth: for the children of Israel have only provoked me to anger with the work of their hands, saith the LORD.

33 And they have ⁸ turned unto me the back, and not the face: though I taught them, ⁹ rising up early and teaching them, yet they have not hearkened to receive instruction.

34 But they ¹⁰ set their abominations in the house which is called by my name, to defile it.

35 And ¹¹ they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; ¹² which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, ¹³ to cause Judah to sin

36 ¶ And ¹⁴ now therefore thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, concerning this city, whereof ye say, ¹⁵ It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence;

V. 24. Mounts. 'The word signifieth any thing that is cast up, as a mount or a rampart; and is also used for engines of war, which were laid on a high place, to shoot into a city, before the invention of guns.'

V. 25. Or rather "Although the city, &c." The prophet seems to have been greatly perplexed when he reflected on this transaction. Perhaps he yet indulged a hope, that the city might be spared; or he feared, that the people would put this construction on his conduct. But having stayed his mind on the perfections of God, and on his sovereignty and wondrous works for Israel, and expressed himself as one assured that he was righteous in all his judgments, he concluded with intimating his difficulties: there was every appearance, that the Chaldeans would speedily succeed in their attempt; yet the Lord ordered him to buy the field, with great exactness about the witnesses and the deeds, though the city was given into the hand of their enemies. And what could be the design of such orders?

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.) "The God of all flesh," or of all men; the Creator, Ruler, and Judge of other nations, as well as Israel, could easily have rescued the city from the Chaldeans, had he seen good: and he could as easily restore it from its ruins. He employed the Chaldeans to inflict his judgments on the Jews; and he would employ the Medes and Persians to execute vengeance on Babylon, to give liberty to his people, and to enable them to rebuild the temple and Jerusalem. (Note, 17.)

V. 28-30. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 31. Jerusalem, or Salem, was built not very long after the deluge. (Note, Gen. xiv. 18-20.) But when David took the city of Zion, he so improved and enlarged Jerusalem, in order that it might be the capital of his kingdom, and the centre of Israel's worship, that he may be considered as the builder of it. He intended that it should be "the holy city;" and in external privileges it was so: but even during his life time many abominations were there committed: and no sooner had Solomon completed his father's designs, than the holy and "faithful city" became an harlot: and continued to be the scene of the grossest idolatries, with little intermission, till the Babylonish captivity.

V. 32-35. (Marg. Ref.)

To cause, &c. The idolatrous kings, princes, and priests, and the false prophets, by their authority, influence, example, menaces, reasonings, and persuasions, "caused Judah to sin;" that is, they proved successful tempters to the people in general.

fulfilled before their eyes: so they seem to have been equally incredulous respecting its future restoration, and generally given up to silent despondency.

V. 37. (Marg. Ref.) 'This promise, taken in its full extent, was not made good to those that returned from captivity; because they were frequently infested with wars, as well by the kings of Syria and Egypt, as by the rest of their neighbours; and were finally subdued and destroyed by the Romans.' (Jerome in Lowth.)

V. 39-41. These verses might have some reference to the revival of religion, which took place after the captivity: but greater and more durable blessings were evidently intended. The introduction of the gospel-dispensation, the conversion of many of the Jews to Christ, their union with each other, and with the Gentile converts, in the worship of God, and perhaps the future conversion of the Jewish nation, must be implied in the prophetic meaning: but the character and privileges of all true Christians are also described. By regeneration the Lord gives them one heart, that is, one judgment and disposition. They often differ in things of inferior consequence, through remaining ignorance, sin, and temptation: but in the more important matters, which respect the divine character and perfections, the evil of sin, and the lost estate of fallen man; the way of salvation through the divine Saviour, and his merits and grace; the nature and excellency of holiness; their obligations to love and serve God; the vanity of the world, and the importance of eternal things; they are all of one mind and judgment. And they are all disposed to repentance, faith in Christ, and love to him and their brethren; to hate sin, and to worship and obey the Lord. Union and communion with God in Christ, and conformity to him, produce congeniality of spirit with each other: so that, as far as they are under the influence of divine grace, they are all of one heart and soul, and disposed to associate and worship together; as children of one family, soldiers of one army, or travellers in one journey. They have also all of them access to God, and acceptance with him in one Way, even through Jesus Christ; and they all habitually walk in the one way of holiness which he hath marked out to them. These blessings are conferred on them, that they may fear, reverence, worship, and obey God through life; and that a succession of such persons may be preserved on earth to the end of the world. This is for their present and future good, and for that of their children after them; who, being trained up under the ordinances of God, have vast advantages above others, and are generally made partakers of the same grace with their parents, when properly educated. With these persons God makes an everlasting covenant, and secures to them the enjoyment of the promised blessings. He engages never to turn away from them, so as to cease to do them good; and to prevent the effects of their own inconstancy and depravity, by putting his fear into their hearts, that they may not depart from him. So that when love declines, and they grow unwatchful, or are tempted to sin; fear revives, they begin to tremble for the consequences, and are thus led to renewed repentance, faith, prayer, watchfulness, and obedience. Thus they cannot forfeit the promised blessings; for the Lord engages for their part in the covenant, as well as for his own: and he will assuredly "rejoice over them to do them good, with his whole heart and soul," for the glory of his name; and will bring them to heaven, even as he restored the captive Jews to the land of Canaan. As nothing like such an unchangeable covenant was made with the Jews after the captivity, we must needs have recourse to a more spiritual and evangelic meaning, in explaining the prophecy. (Note, xxxi. 31-34.)

Plant. The re-establishment of Israel and Judah in Canaan, and their union as one nation, after conversion to Christ, is here, as well as in many other places, most clearly and emphatically predicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

The judgments of God often come gradually upon sinners; but always without fail, when not prevented by timely repentance. They who harden their hearts against the warnings of his word, will hate and persecute those that faithfully declare them. But if God be for us, we need not fear the power of any adversary: and they who fight against him, can never prosper in resisting the executors of his vengeance. Ministers should in their whole conduct exhibit an example of implicit obedience, and evince that they really believe the doctrines which they teach to others: they should appear disinterested, and attentive to every relative duty: and though they must not entangle themselves in the affairs of this life, yet, in needful secular concerns, they should act with punctuality and exactness, avoiding all appearance of evil, and precluding, as far as possible, all occasions of contention to survivors. — Earthly inheritances are never of very great value: but in times of great public calamities, and in the hour of death, they begin to appear in their real insignificance: and in the same interesting seasons men begin to form a more proper estimate of the value of an inheritance in heaven. This consideration should direct our habitual judgment and conduct. Whatever creates perplexity should lead us to the throne of grace: and though we must not hesitate to obey God, when we do not perceive the reasons of his commandments, yet we should seek increasing light, that our obedience may be more intelligent. When we cannot understand any particular providential dispensations, we may profitably recur to first and general principles. We are sure that nothing can be too hard for the Creator of the world, that the Judge of all the earth will do right, and that the Saviour of sinners cannot be defective in goodness and mercy. If then the Lord recompense the iniquities of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them, we may be sure that it consists with his justice: and if he suffer his people to be afflicted by their enemies, it must be the result of his wisdom, truth, and mercy. Whatever he promises or threatens he can easily effect: for “he is great in council, and mighty in operation; and “his eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men, “to give to every one according to his doings.” The works that he hath wrought for the salvation of his people and the ruin of his enemies, and to make his name glorious, should be considered as so many specimens of his general conduct, and demonstrations that he will perform his whole word. Alas, how many are there, who enjoy his providential bounties and the means of grace in abuncomfort, and prosperity connected with those events, 1—13: concerning the coming of Christ, and the performance of the covenant-engagements of God to the Levites and to David, in him, and in his church, 14—26.

dance, who will not obey his voice; nay, will do nothing of all that he hath commanded them to do! Therefore evil comes upon them: and while suffering the punishment of their sins, they will remember that “thus it was written, “and thus it must be.”

V. 26—44.

When we have meditated with prayer and praise on the divine perfections and conduct, and have referred to him those things that have troubled us, we shall frequently find our minds composed and satisfied, even before we have received a solution of our difficulties: and the Lord will make known to his people his will, as far as their duty and peace are concerned. But he is of one mind, and his purposes are irreversible: he will relax nothing of his requirements, nor at all mitigate the sentence denounced against the impenitent. When the authority, influence, or example of ungodly men causes others to commit abomination; and when peculiar advantages for instruction are neglected and abused, the wrath of God will burn fiercely against the transgressors. But though the misconduct of vast multitudes has from the beginning made his visible Church a provocation of his anger, he will not forsake it: but, having destroyed the rebels from among his chosen remnant, he will gather them from all places into his fold, and cause them to dwell safely. To those who are indeed his people, and who have the Lord for their God, he giveth “one heart and one way,” that they may be like minded with himself and each other; their filial fear and reverential worship does not mar the exercise of their grateful love and joy, but concurs in producing active and watchful obedience: this is as much for their good as for his glory, and entails the most valuable blessings on their posterity. Let us seek an interest in these precious promises, and rest in nothing short of them: let us remember that unity of heart and worship among Christians comes from the Spirit of God; and discord from sin and Satan: and let us “endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of “peace.” Let us diligently seek the good of our children after us, and “bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.” Let us earnestly come to Christ, and constantly use the means of grace: thus we shall know, that the everlasting covenant is made with us, and that the Lord will neither turn from us, nor leave us to depart from him. But it is his plan to preserve his people by putting his fear into their hearts: a confidence, therefore, that is never shaken by fear, even when disgraced by sin, is very suspicious; and some tender trembling Christians have better evidence of their safety, than they can be made to perceive. But we should be careful not to persuade men to a degree of confidence above their experience, diligence, conscientiousness, and simplicity: for this counteracts the Lord’s plan. They who are interested in the covenant,

12 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Again in this place, which is desolate without man and without beast, and * in all the cities thereof, shall be an habitation of shepherds causing their flocks to lie down

13 In ¹ the cities of the mountains, in the cities of the vale, and in the cities of the south, and in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, ² shall the flocks pass again under the hands of him that telleth them, saith the LORD.

14 ¶ Behold, ^a the days come, saith the LORD, that I will ^b perform that good thing, which I have promised unto the house of Israel, and to the house of Judah.

15 In those days, ^c and at that time, will I cause the Branch of righteousness to grow up unto David; ^d and he shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land.

16 In those days ^e shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely: and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, * The LORD our righteousness.

17 For thus saith the LORD: † David shall ^f never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel.

18 Neither ^g shall the priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings, and to do sacrifice continually.

19 ¶ And the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, saying,

20 Thus saith the LORD; ^b If ye can break ^a my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season;

21 Then ¹ may also my covenant be broken with David my servant, ^k that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; ^l and with the Levites the priests, my ministers.

22 As ^m the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured: ⁿ so will I multiply the seed of David my servant, and ^o the Levites that minister unto me.

23 ¶ Moreover, the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, saying,

24 Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, ^p saying, ^q The two families which the LORD hath chosen, he hath even cast them off? ^r Thus they have despised my people, that they should be no more a nation before them.

25 Thus saith the LORD; ^s If my covenant be not with day and night, ^t and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth;

26 Then ¹ will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for ^u I will cause their captivity to return, ^v and have mercy on them.

most eminent saints, in the most prosperous times, is peculiarly striking; especially as connected with the joy expressed, during prosperity, in the common concerns of life, and showing, that these also would be conducted, with a hearty regard to the will and glory of God.—‘Kimchi observes on this place; that none but eucharistical sacrifices shall be in use in the times of the Messiah.’ (Lonth.)

V. 12, 13. (Marg. Ref.)
 V. 14—16. (Note, xxiii. 5, 6.) In the passage referred to, “the Lord our righteousness” is given as the name of Christ; but here the Church is thus called. The privilege, in which above all other she glories, is, that JEHOVAH is her righteousness: and this is the peculiarity which distinguishes true believers from all other persons. The words, however, are more literally rendered in the old translation: “and he that shall call her is the Lord our righteousness.”
 V. 17, 18. Christ is both the King and high priest of his Church: in him the covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, and that of priesthood made with Aaron and his seed and brethren, received their full completion: and all the sacrifices of that dispensation were superseded by his one oblation of himself, the efficacy of which remaineth for ever. But the continuance of a regular ministry amongst Christians, and the privileges of believers, who are a royal priesthood as united unto Christ, seem also to be predicted; and in this latter sense it is afterwards said, (22,) that the seed of David and the Levites would be multiplied as the sand of the sea.

V. 20—23. (Marg. Ref.) (Note, Gen. viii. 20—22.)
 V. 24. Despised, &c. The Jews despised the privilege of being God’s people, when they were driven out of Canaan for their sins; and the nations despised them, as if no more to be a people, but the Lord intended to restore them from their captivity, and to raise up Christ among them; and in both respects to perform the mercy promised to their fathers.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The prophet is sent to assure Zedekiah, that the city would be taken: and that he is carried to Babylon, and there delivered to the king of Babylon. -7. The princes and the king are wanted to set free the king. -8. The king, again reduce the king to bondage. -9. God by the prophet speaks of liberty to the sword, and of the king's fall; and predicts the success of the Chaldeans, against Jerusalem, and against all the cities thereof,) saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; Go and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah, and tell him, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire.

3 And thou shalt not escape out of his hand, but shalt surely be taken, and delivered into his hand, and thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with thee mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon.

4 Yet hear the word of the LORD, O Zedekiah king of Judah; Thus saith the LORD of thee, Thou shalt not die by the sword;

the same manner others are over-awed and kept from doing them further injury. Though the Lord will hide his face from his people for their sins; yet he will return to repair the desolations of his Church: and, notwithstanding interruptions, the voice of joy and thanksgiving shall be heard in the dwellings of the righteous. Whilst they praise him for his everlasting mercy, they cannot but rejoice in him; and their sacrifices of praise are highly acceptable and honourable to him, when presented in the name of his beloved Son. Where he gives righteousness and peace, he will supply all temporal wants; and our relations and possessions will be comfortable to us, in proportion as they are sanctified by the word of God and prayer. When his time comes, he will perform every good thing that he hath promised to his Church: and as he fulfilled his word, in giving his Son to be the sacrifice for our sins and the Lord our Righteousness, who was emphatically "that good thing promised to the house of Israel;" it would be the most inexcusable incredulity, to question the performance of any of his engagements. Through this our righteous King, who reigns on the throne of David, and is our High-priest upon his throne, let us bring our spiritual sacrifices, continually giving thanks to our God and Father by him. Let us pray, that the royal priesthood may be multiplied, as the sand of the sea: and in order to this, that able and faithful ministers may be sent forth into every place, to call sinners to the knowledge of salvation, and to excite his people to glorify God with their lips and in their lives. Whilst we value our privileges, as the people of God, let us not despise those families, which were of old his chosen, though for a time they seem to be cast off: for as he hath appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth, and the sun and moon know their appointed seasons; so surely will he cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them. And as he, who rules over the whole spiritual seed of Abraham, sprang from that nation according to the flesh, he will deem his honour concerned in bringing them again into his Church, and restoring them to their former privileges.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord more values, favours, and honours his faithful servants in a prison, than ungodly princes on their thrones, or hypocritical priests in the temple; and his presence and consolations can make any situation pleasant. He, that created and upholds the earth, forms and establishes the Church; and no power can prevail against him. All blessings must be sought by fervent prayer, which the Lord never fails to answer. The trembling sinner, when he begins to call upon God, soon begins to discover and experience such glory and blessedness, as before he could not have conceived. And as the believer continues to call on the Lord, he is led further and further in the same way, and finds, in every thing, that he is "able to do exceedingly abundantly for him, above all that he can ask or think." But when the saint shall arrive in heaven, what great, what glorious, what hidden things will he shown him, when he shall see the Lord as he is, be made like him, and know even as he is known! When sinners are suffering under divine corrections, or trembling for fear of the wrath to come, they only increase and prolong their miseries, by delaying to submit to God: but when they cast themselves unreservedly on his mercy, he brings health and cure to their souls, and reveals to them the abundance of his peace and truth. His sanctifying grace and pardoning mercy are inseparably connected: he certainly pardons all whom he cleanses; and cleanses all whom he pardons: "they who are thus washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," are enabled to walk before him in peace and purity; and he takes pleasure in them, and is glorified by them, and in his goodness to them, before those that are without. Many are thus led to perceive a real difference betwixt the people of God, and the world around them; and to fear his wrath, for their enmity to those whom he delighteth to honour. Thus they tremble at the view of the prosperity and joy of believers, and are led to inquire after his salvation, and at length to partake of it; while in

5 But thou shalt die in peace: and with the burnings of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn odours for thee; and they will lament thee, saying, Ah, lord! for I have pronounced the word, saith the Lord.

6 Then Jeremiah the prophet spake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem,

7 When the king of Babylon's army fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities of Judah that were left, against Lachish, and against Azekah; for these defended cities remained of the cities of Judah.

8 This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the Lord, after that the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, to proclaim liberty unto them;

9 That every man should let his man-servant, and every man his maid-servant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother.

10 Now when all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his man-servant, and every one his maid-servant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, then they obeyed, and let them go.

11 But afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the hand-maids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and for handmaids.

12 Therefore the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying,

13 Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel; I made a covenant with your fathers, in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondmen, saying,

14 At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear.

15 And ye were now turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour; and ye had made a covenant before me,

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 2-5. (xxxii. 1-5.) Zedekiah was assured that he should be taken prisoner and carried captive, notwithstanding all his efforts to defend himself, or to escape by flight; but he was also informed that he should not be slain in battle, or die a violent death; but that he should die in peace according to the course of nature. Perhaps he was brought to repentance, and died at peace with God. It was, however, foretold that the Jews would show him the same respect which had been paid to other kings of Judah after their decease; and lament, that in his days the measure of their national iniquity was completed, and the family of David reduced so low; though he was not so desperately wicked as some of his predecessors had been. It is not known at what time Zedekiah died.

V. 8-11. (Notes, Exod. xxi. 2-6.) The Jews did not generally observe the divine law, in freeing their brethren who had become slaves, after they had served them seven years. But when Jerusalem was straitened by the Chaldeans, the king, perhaps excited by Jeremiah, entered into a solemn covenant with the people to set at liberty all their Hebrew slaves: and it was proclaimed that none of them, on any pretence, should thus illegally use the service of their brethren: accordingly the law was in this respect complied with. But when Pharaoh's army came out of Egypt to assist them, and the Chaldeans had left the siege of Jerusalem to go and meet them, thinking the danger was over, they impiously violated their solemn covenant, and with the most cruel injustice reduced to slavery the very persons to whom they had just before given freedom.

Princes. The verse may be thus translated, "All the princes consented that every one should let his man-servant go free: they consented, I say, and let them go." (Lowth.)

V. 14. "The seventh year was the year of release, (Deut. xv. 9;) consequently servants were to continue in service but six years, and at the beginning of the seventh were to be made free." Thus, "at the end of three years, thou shalt bring forth all the tithe, &c." "The third year is the year of tithing." (Deut. xiv. 28. xxxvi. 12.) "So Christ is said to "rise again after three days," which is elsewhere explained by his rising on the third day." (Lowth.) It is generally supposed that the slaves should have been set at liberty on each sabbatical year: but in that case many of them would have served far less than six years; and this is not expressly mentioned, either in the law of liberating slaves, or in that of keeping the sabbatical year. It is, however, likely that when no special reasons required the contrary, the observance of it was attended by giving liberty to slaves, as well as a release of insolvent debtors; and that the transaction here recorded was on a sabbatical year, though the calculations of learned men on that subject are not very satisfactory. V. 18, 19. (Note, Gen. xv. 10.) This ceremony of dividing the sacrifice, and passing between the parts of it, implied an imprecation on the persons covenanting, (if they brake their engagement,) that they might be thus cut asunder, and made a sacrifice to divine justice.

V. 20-22. (Marg. Ref. and notes on the texts referred to.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the midst of wrath the Lord remembers mercy : and whatever calamities a sinner endures through life, or however he ends his days, if he dies at peace with God, he is highly favoured : and as faithful reproofs and severe corrections tend far more to this happy event, than flattery and prosperity ; they are in themselves far preferable, though seldom chosen. The mercy of God to us should teach us mercy to our brethren ; but they that despise his authority, commonly abuse their authority over others. Yet the Lord will severely punish even the greatest princes for oppressing their meanest slaves. Many things contained in the word of God are not known to his professed worshippers, which they will sometimes obey, when set before them : and this is one end and use of preaching.—When those in authority join example to their influence in promoting equity and humanity, they may effect great things in a little time : and this, as far as it goes, is doing right in the sight of God, who loveth righteousness and mercy. But when reformation springs only from terror and the prospect of imminent destruction, it is seldom durable. Many in such circumstances, seem very penitent, make hasty resolutions and solemn engagements, and " do many things ;" but when the terror is subsided, they repent of their repentance, fall more entirely under the power of their sins, and seem in haste to undo the little good they had done. Solemn vows and sacramental engagements, thus entered into, only pollute the name and profane the ordinances of the Lord ; and they, who are most forward to bind themselves by imprecations to perform their vows, are commonly most ready to violate them. But if men repent of their repentance, God will repent of his forbearance ; " they shall have judgment without " mercy, who have showed no mercy ;" and they, who will not obey God in their conduct towards those whom they have been used to oppress, will be cast out of his protection, and exposed to his temporal and eternal judgments. Let us then look to our hearts ; that our repentance may be genuine, and that the law of loving God supremely, and our neighbour as ourselves, may be so written in our hearts, as to regulate our conduct in all our transactions.

ancestor Jonadab, they drank none, and lived in tents, &c. 1—11. The disobedience of the Jews contrasted with this example, 12—17. Promises to the Rechabites. 18, 19

THE word, which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, * in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying,

2 Go unto ^b the house of the Rechabites, and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the LORD, ^c into one of the chambers, and give them wine to drink.

3 Then I took Jaazaniah the son of Jeremiah, the son of Habaziniab, and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house of the Rechabites;

4 And I brought them into the house of the LORD, ^d into the chamber of the sons of Hanan, the son of Igdaliah, ^e a man of God, which was by ^f the chamber of the princes, which was above the chamber of Maaseiah the son of Shalum, ^g the keeper of the * door.

5 And I set before the sons of the house of the Rechabites pots full of wine, and cups, and I said unto them, ^b Drink ye wine.

6 But they said, We will drink no wine: ^h for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us, saying, ^k Ye shall drink no wine, Neither ye, nor your sons, for ever:

7 Neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have ^l ye: but ^l all your days ye shall dwell in tents; ^m that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers.

8 Thus have ⁿ we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father, in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters;

9 Nor to build houses for us to dwell in: ^o neither have we vineyard, nor field, nor seed:

10 But we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us.

11 But it came to pass, ^p when Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came up into the land, that we said, ^q Come, and let us go to Jerusalem for fear of the army of the Chaldeans, and for fear of the army of the Syrians: so we dwell at Jerusalem.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1. The Rechabites were a family of the Kenites, who descended from Moses' father-in-law, (Notes, Judg. i. 15. 1 Chron. ii. 55.) They had dwelt in the land from the first, but no inheritance seems to have been allotted them. It was doubtless well known, that they had rules of conduct peculiar to themselves; but this trial was made, to show their steady adherence to their rules, and the reasons they assigned for it, in order to shame the disobedience of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Rechabites were descended from the Kenites; they were never incorporated with the Jews;—but yet were looked on as friends and allies.—They were worshippers of the true God, though they were not circumcised.' (Louth.)—The prophet seems to have brought the Rechabites into a chamber adjoining to the temple, and to have been particular in describing it, in order to render the transaction more public: and Hanan being a man of God, would readily accommodate them.

V. 5. God commanded Jeremiah to give the Rechabites wine to drink; but he did not command them to drink, so that they were free to refuse it.

V. 6, 7. (Note, 2 Kings x. 15, 16.) Jonadab lived about three hundred years before this time. He had probably practised these rules himself; and having trained up his children to habits of abstemiousness, he enjoined them and their posterity to adhere to them. He seems to have desired, that they should be, as much as possible, kept from temptations to avarice, luxury, and sensuality; and be a hardy, self-denied, and industrious race. He might also foresee the calamities, which were likely to come on Judah and Israel, and desire that his posterity should be prepared for the worst. He seems to have wished them to avoid giving umbrage, or exciting the jealousy or envy of those among whom they lived, which would have been the natural effect of their living in opulence, magnificence, or luxury: for one reason of his rules was, "that they might live long in the land where they were strangers." But, above all, he doubtless meant that they should be devoted to God, as a race of perpetual Nazarites: and he deemed these rules conducive to this end, and calculated to render them simple, humble, patient, and superior to the delights of sense. Such injunctions of dying parents, or others, can only be considered as counsels: and if consistent with Scripture, suited to the circumstances of the times, and neither put in the place of the merits of Christ, nor in that of obedience to God's commandments, but subordinated to them, and used in subserviency to true godliness, they may be given and observed with propriety and advantage. The Rechabites and the Nazarites resembled the religious orders in the Romish church, more than any other persons in the Old Testament; yet they were not forbidden to marry, nor commanded "to abstain from meats." No restriction was laid on them in these respects.

12 ¶ Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying,

13 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Go and tell the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, 'Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words? saith the LORD.

14 The words of Jonadab the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; for unto this day they drink none, but obey their father's commandment; notwithstanding I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking; but ye hearkened not unto me.

15 I have sent also unto you all my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them, saying, Return ye now every man from his evil way, and amend your doings, and go not after other gods to serve them, and ye shall dwell in the land which I have given to you and to your fathers: but ye have not inclined your ear, nor hearkened unto me.

16 Because the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab have performed the commandment of their father, which he commanded them; but this people hath not hearkened unto me:

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, all the evil that I have pronounced against them: because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered.

18 ¶ And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according unto all he hath commanded you:

19 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; * Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.

ness, would favour their preservation amid the desolations of the land; even their poverty would tend to secure them from the conqueror: and it was proper that God should avow his readiness to reward every degree of good, when he determined to punish his apostate people. Accordingly he promised, that the family of the Rechabites should be very durably continued; and upheld in the practice of piety and righteousness before him, as his accepted worshippers, even when the Jews were cast out of his sight. This appears to be the meaning of the expression, "to stand before the LORD;" for it cannot be supposed that they performed any service at the temple. Nothing is known respecting the fulfilment of this promise; but doubtless it was performed, and perhaps may be so to this day.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every method should be used to bring men to repentance: and when promises and threatenings prove ineffectual, we should attempt to shame them out of their iniquities. Man is greatly the creature of habit: thus the abstemiousness, which to some would be intolerable, to others is easy, because customary; and they are not affected by temptations, which to others are irresistible. The longer and the more carefully wise and pious men have observed the course of the world, the more fully have they been convinced that it is vain, vexatious, and ensnaring: and that separation from it, (as far as duty will admit,) is far safer and happier, than the most successful pursuit of its pleasures and possessions. It may not be advisable for us to restrict ourselves by such rules, as were prescribed by Jonadab: but it is necessary to learn indifference about all

CHAP. XXXVI.

Jeremiah, at God's command, causes Baruch to write in a roll all his threatening prophecies, 1-7. Baruch reads the roll publicly, and afterwards to the princes, who counsel him and Jeremiah to hide themselves, 8-19. Jehudi reads it before Jehoiakim, who casts it into the fire, contrary to the request of the princes; and orders Jeremiah and Baruch to be apprehended: "but the LORD hid them," 20-26. Jeremiah is directed again to write the same, with many like words, and a dreadful sentence against the king; which he does by the hand of Baruch, 27-32.

AND it came to pass ^a in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, that this word came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying,
 2 Take thee ^b a roll of a book, and write therein all the words that I have spoken unto thee ^d against Israel, and 4 Then Jeremiah called ^l Baruch the son of Neriah: and Baruch ^m wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the LORD, which he had spoken unto him, upon a roll of a book.

worldly things; to consider ourselves as strangers on earth, and to be devoted to God, and disposed to prefer that station, and that way of life, which are best for our souls. We should habituate our appetites to brook denial even in things lawful; and thus inure ourselves to resist temptation, to be contented with mean fare, and to be prepared for all events. It is not generally advisable for young persons to forsake the plain honest employments of their parents; or to be ambitious of living in a more elegant or fashionable style: that is, amid stronger temptations to pride, luxury, sensuality and rapacity. Prudence and moderation are conducive to piety; and tend to preserve families from the contagion of prevailing iniquity and ungodliness: by shunning competition and envy, they tend to peace and comfort; by avoiding excess, they promote health and long life: the more mortified we are to this present world, the readier we shall be to leave it, that we may go to a better: and thus we may live and die happy, though we never possess houses or lands, or those other envied acquisitions, which most men waste their lives in pursuing. But whatever rules we prescribe to ourselves or receive from others, we must count nothing indispensable but the law of God: for there will be circumstances, when regard to safety may render it necessary to dispense with them. Yet no prudence or good behaviour can exempt us from sharing the common calamities, to which sin hath subjected mankind. How common is it for men to be more observant of the rules of their order, circle, or sect, or of the traditions of their fathers, than professed Christians are of the precepts of God's word! Respect to the memory, and authority or counsel, of pious parents will always meet with some recompense from God, and is commonly made effectual for the continuance of true religion in families through successive generations. But they who can neither be awed by the terror, nor allured by the goodness, of God, to repent of sin and return to him; who despise his authority, which is absolute; their obligations to him, which are infinite; his justice and wrath, which are almighty to punish, and his mercy and readiness to forgive, which are boundless and everlasting, will perish miserably: and all the world will see the justice of God in the condemnation of those who disobey his commandments, and neglect his great salvation.

 V. 2. From, &c. This was twenty-three years, from the thirteenth of Josiah, when the prophet was first appointed to his office. (Notes, i.)

V. 3. The Lord foresaw that the people would not hear and obey: but it was proper that the prophet should do every thing that could tend to awaken their attention. His endeavours might be useful to individuals, and the rebels would thus appear the more inexcusable. 'God's foreknowledge of future events does not put any force upon men's will, or take away the liberty of human actions.' (Lowth.)

V. 4. Jeremiah seems not to have possessed the skill "of a ready writer;" and therefore Baruch, who might be a more learned man, was employed as his secretary. We frequently read of him, as the assistant and companion of Jeremiah; (Notes, xlv.) (Marg. Ref.) but the apocryphal book that bears his name seems to be altogether a forgery.

17 And they asked Baruch, saying, ^l Tell us now, How didst thou write all these words at his mouth?

V. 6, 7. Some think, that this was the great expiation, called, by way of eminence, the fast: (Acts xxvii. 9:) but others suppose it to have been a fast that was observed on account of the calamitous state of the nation. ' He ^{showeth}, that fasting, without prayer and repentance, ^{availeth} nothing, but is mere hypocrisy.'

V. 9. As the command was given in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and this is dated in his fifth year, many expositors are of opinion that the roll was twice read: once in the fourth year, when it was little noticed, and afterwards in the fifth year. And as Jeremiah was shut up, when he first ordered Baruch to read the roll, but had liberty to make his escape after it had been read, (5. 19;) they conclude that two distinct readings must be intended. Others think, that the writing of the roll might take up a considerable time; and that it was deemed expedient to wait for the fasting day, as the most convenient time for reading it, which was in the fifth year of Jehoiakim: and that Jeremiah was not shut up in prison, but confined from going to the temple, by some other hindrance: and though he was at liberty when the notice was taken of Baruch's reading the roll, yet he had not gone up to the temple to read it himself. If the roll was twice read, (which indeed seems the more probable opinion,) it is supposed, that the first time was on the great day of atonement: and that soon after Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and carried Jehoiakim to Babylon, (Note, 2 Kings, xxiv. 1. Dan. i. 2.) But having made submissions to the victor, he was restored to the throne; and just after his return the roll; was read the second time, on a fast, proclaimed and observed in commemoration of that first taking of Jerusalem; and which hath ever since been annually observed by the Jews on the eighteenth day of the ninth month.

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11-13. Though the fast was proclaimed by authority, yet it does not appear, that either the King or his princes attended the observance of it at the temple. Nor can it be determined, whether Michaiah meant to call the attention of the princes to the word of God, or to inform them against Baruch. Baruch had the use of Gemariah's chamber, who was father to Michaiah, and probably by his consent; and Ahikam, another of Shaphan's sons, protected Jeremiah on a similar occasion. (xxvi. 24:) Yet neither Gemariah nor Ahikam seem to have been present when the roll was read.

V. 16. 'The judgments denounced were so terrible as to make the ears of them that heard them to tingle.' (Louth.)—'The godly were afraid, seeing God was so offended; and the wicked were astonished at the horror of the punishment.'

V. 17, 18. Perhaps the princes supposed that Baruch had written his roll from memory; and that it was rather 19 Then said the princes unto Baruch, ^o Go, hide thee, thou and Jeremiah; and let no man know where ye be.

20 ¶ And they went in to the king into the court, (but ^o they laid up the roll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe,) and told all the words in the ears of the king.

21 So the king sent ^p Jehudi to fetch the roll: and he took it out of Elishama the scribe's chamber. ^q And Jehudi read it in the ears of the king, and in the ears of all the princes which stood beside the king.

22 Now the king sat ^r in the winterhouse in the ninth month: and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him.

23 And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, ^s he cut it with the penknife, and cast ^t it into the fire that was on the hearth, until the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth.

24 Yet ^u they were not afraid, ^v nor rent their garments, neither the king, nor any of his servants that heard all these words.

25 Nevertheless ^x Elnathan, and Delaiah, and Gemariah had ^y made intercession to the king that he would not burn the roll: but he would not hear them.

26 But the king commanded Jerahmeel the son of ^{*} Hammelech, and Seraiah the son of Azriel, and Shelemiah the son of Abdeel, ^z to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet; ^a but the Lord hid them.

27 ¶ Then the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, (after ^b that the king had burned the roll, and the words which Baruch wrote at the mouth of Jeremiah,) saying,

28 Take thee again ^c another roll, and write in it all the former words that were in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the king of Judah hath burned.

29 And thou shalt say to Jehoiakim king of Judah, Thus saith the Lord; ^d Thou hast burned this roll, saying, ^e Why hast thou written therein, saying, The king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease from thence man and beast?

30 Therefore thus saith the Lord of Jehoiakim king of Judah; ^f He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: ^g and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost.

to be considered as his composition, than as the substance of Jeremiah's prophecies: and they might ask this apparently frivolous question, in order to silence the alarms excited by considering it as the word of God, and in full force against them. But Baruch, with great simplicity, so answered their question, as to show that he only acted as amanuensis to Jeremiah, and wrote verbatim what he had dictated to him.

V. 19. The princes had some conviction, that this was a message from God, and were not disposed to persecute Baruch or Jeremiah; yet they would not duly regard the divine authority, nor venture the king's displeasure. He must be informed, and they were aware that he would attempt to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch, and therefore they advised them to conceal themselves.

V. 23-25. It was scarcely possible for a man to show more contempt and defiance of God, than Jehoiakim did on this occasion. The predictions that he had heard had been delivered during a long course of years, by a prophet of established reputation: many of his prophecies had already been fulfilled; as Jehoiakim's late captivity at Babylon, and his state of subjection to Nebuchadnezzar, proved; and they were all coincident with the written word of God, and were addressed immediately to him and his princes. Yet he treated them with the utmost disregard; and deliberately burned the roll, as if the destruction of the sentence could have prevented its execution! And though his princes were not so totally callous, but entertained him not to burn the roll: yet it was a great proof of their insensibility, that they rent not their clothes, and showed no tokens of grief or consternation, either when the roll was read, or when it was so impiously destroyed. Compare Jehoiakim's conduct with that of his father Josiah, in circumstances not totally dissimilar. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. Hid, &c. Jeremiah and Baruch, by divine direction, lay concealed in some place where their persecutors could not find them.

V. 29. To Jehoiakim. 'Or, "of Jehoiakim;" for this command seems to have been given to Jeremiah during 'the time of his concealment.' (Louth.) This is the latest prophecy of Jeremiah, in which Jehoiakim is mentioned, or which is dated from the years of his reign; though he lived about six years afterwards, (xxv. 1. xxvii. 1.) Perhaps the prophet lay concealed, during that whole time, from the blood-thirsty rage of the king: at least he was directed to let him alone, as one given up to a reprobate mind, for his daring impiety and wickedness on this occasion: while the sentence denounced against him, not being immediately executed, and the prophet apparently silenced, he would be the more hardened in treating the whole as a delusion.

V. 30, 31. (Note, xxii. 18, 19.) Jeconiah sat a very short time on his father's throne, and being carried captive to Babylon, was succeeded by his uncle Zedekiah. No other of Jehoiakim's race was king over Judah, though some of them had authority under the kings of Persia: and Mary the mother of our Lord was not descended from Solomon, but from Nathan the son of David. Jeconiah indeed is mentioned in our Lord's genealogy by St. Matthew; but that is the line of Joseph, not of Mary, (Notes, xxii. 29, 30. Matt. i. Luke ii. 23—33.)

V. 32. 'Though the wicked think to have abolished the word of God, when they have burnt the book thereof, yet this declareth that God will not only raise it up again, but also increase it, in greater abundance, to their condemnation.' During the persecutions, which the Papists carried on against the reformers and others whom they called heretics; the burning of Bibles was a very common practice, to which this note refers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Faithful ministers must use every method of awakening the consciences of sinners, if peradventure God will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the "truth." His revealed word, and not his secret purpose, is the rule of their conduct; and they must "declare his whole counsel," whether men will hear or forbear, and without desisting because of ill success.—The Lord declares the evil he purposes to do against sinners; that they may "hear and fear, and return from their evil ways;" they who make this use of his warnings, in dependence on his promised mercy, will find him ready to forgive all their iniquities; and all others will be left without excuse. Different advantages result from the proposal of truth by word of mouth, and by writing; the former is generally more copious, particular, energetic, and affecting; the latter more exact, compendious, and permanent. Both should then be used, "according to the ability that God giveth to every man." Many attend upon the outward forms of Religion, and pretend humiliation, mortification, and devotions, who are not humbled for their sins, and who do not mortify their lusts, present their supplication before the Lord, or turn from their evil ways. Yet when multitudes are collected together on such occasions, the ministers of God may find a favourable opportunity of calling them to repentance, and warning them to flee from impending judgments. But national fasts, without national reformation, will avail little to turn away the wrath of God; especially as they who appoint such solemnities, often do not so much as sanction them by their own example! A faithful declaration of divine truth will attract some attention: but in general it reaches last the ears of those who are most advanced in rank and authority, and too often finds them most closed against it. Even such as have some conviction of the truth and importance of what they hear, and are disposed to favour those employed in preaching it, are so surrounded with persons of another stamp, and have so many reserves about their own safety, ease, character, interest, or preference, that they often dare not act according to their convictions, but endeavour to silence them as soon as they can, by some evasion or other: and they often flatter themselves into a persuasion, that they act nobly in their circumstances, if they do not take an active part in persecution, but covertly shelter the servants of God from the rage of their enemies. But they who would follow the Lord wholly, and be indeed the disciples of Christ, must be prepared to venture and suffer every thing in his cause.

V. 20—32.

There are degrees of guilt even among the ungodly; and condemnation will be proportioned to them. Some rapidly arrive at the height of impiety and presumption; and none more so, than they who have broken off from a religious education. Many act as if their outrages against the word of God could save them from the condemnation denounced by it; or as if their irrational infidelity could invalidate all the demonstrations which we have of its divine original, and render the sacred oracles of none effect! But such persons should be openly opposed, whatever their rank in life or abilities may be: and a few gentle persuasions do not form a sufficient testimony against their impiety: but their contempt of God's word should be noticed with unequivocal tokens of disapprobation, concern, yea, abhorrence. The Lord himself will protect those who are valiant for his truth, from all their enemies, until they have finished their testimony; and then it is of small consequence by what means they are removed to heaven. But all their opposers will treasure up wrath, and add to the weight of that condemnation, which they would not endure to be told of: for God will honour those who honour him, and in proportion as men despise him, they must sink into contempt and misery.

V. 16. The prophet was left for a considerable time in this wretched condition, namely, till the Chaldeans returned and renewed the siege.

V. 17—21. The princes of Jehoiakim were more favourable to the prophet than their king, and afraid of his displeasure : but Zedekiah was less inveterate than his princes, and afraid of them in favouring him. When Jeremiah was interrogated about the word of the Lord, he neither concealed nor softened his message, but plainly told the king, that he would be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon: yet he meant to plead for favour, and to present his supplication to him; to which this might have been deemed a very impolitic preface. But he had truth, reason, justice, and the king's conscience, on his side; and he needed no subtleties or artifices. He could appeal to Zedekiah, that he had not offended him or his princes, except by faithfully declaring his message: and the flattering prophets, who had promised them peace, were convicted by the event of being deceivers. Surely then he ought not to be sent back to his noisome dungeon, where he must shortly die by famine or disease. Zedekiah indeed was induced in some measure to grant his request, yet he still kept him confined; and though he gave orders that he should be supplied with food, so as to secure him from dying for want; yet his sustentance was mean and scanty, and he was soon after treated with great cruelty.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Numbers witness the fatal effects of other men's sins, and yet heedlessly step into their places, and steer the same destructive course: and many, who pay no regard to the instructions and warnings of faithful ministers, will in great extremities, desire their prayers. Every respite given to hardened sinners encourages their presumption; they trust to fallacious appearances, and despise the word of God; and they deceive themselves by vain words, till wrath comes upon them to the uttermost. But whatever present appearances may be, the Scriptures must be fulfilled, and the feeblest, most unlikely, or despised persons will suffice to execute the vengeance of God, and to disappoint the confidence of those who rebel against him. It is unspeakably wearisome to zealous ministers, to witness those crimes and miseries which they cannot prevent: and cruel treatment, united with ill success, is apt to render them reluctant to their work, and disposed to court privacy and obscurity. But every step they take will be misrepresented by perverse opposers: the most disinterested friends of their country may sometimes be treated as traitors or rebels, and the most upright and blameless accused of the worst of crimes; and such calumnies will meet with more credit than all their asseverations and pleas in their own behalf. Thus, whilst the enemies of God have lodged in palaces and indulged in luxury, his faithful servants have been smarting with wounds, loaded with ignominy and fetters, immured in loathsome dungeons, or dying by famine or torture. But ere long it will be said of the afflicted believer, and to the prosperous sinner, "Now he is comforted, but thou art tormented." Many secretly favour the servants of God, who, through fear of man and love of sin, will not follow their counsel. No respect of persons, or carnal policy, must warp the plain and direct testimony of the faithful minister, when addressing himself to the proudest and most powerful of the sons of men, whose frown he has most cause to fear, and from whose favour he might hope many temporal advantages. Yet, as far as consists with this faithfulness, he may properly reason with those who injuriously treat him; inquire what offence he has committed by plainly speaking the word of God; and show that they who flatter them are proved to be deceivers by evident facts, and stand condemned even in the consciences of those who suffer themselves to be deluded by them: and even they, who are most ready to die for the truth, may and ought to use lawful means of self preservation, and of obtaining fairer treatment. All this, however, should be done with great meekness; without reproaches, or acrimonious complaints: and the bolder any man is in the cause of God, the more gentle, patient, and pliant, should he be about his own concerns: his message must be delivered with authority over the consciences even of the greatest princes; but he should be ready to speak with deference and submission, and as a supplicant, when pleading his own cause. The Lord has all hearts in his hands, and can incline his enemies

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Jeremiah, being accused of disheartening the people by his prophecies, is cast into a miry dungeon, 1—6. He is taken out at the suit of Ebed-melech, an Ethiopian, 7—13. In a private conference, he counsels Zedekiah to save himself and the city, by surrendering, 14—23. Zedekiah requiring him, he conceals what had passed from the princes; and remains in the court of the prison, till the taking of the city, 24—28.

WHEN Shephatiah the son of Mat-tan, and Gedaliah the son of Pashur, and Jucal the son of Shelemiah, and Pashur the son of Malchiah, heard the words that Jeremiah had spoken unto all the people, saying,

2 Thus saith the Lord, He that remaineth in this city shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth forth to the Chaldeans shall live; for he shall have his life for a prey, and shall live.

3 Thus saith the Lord, This city shall surely be given into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which shall take it.

4 Therefore the princes said unto the king, We beseech thee, let this man be put to death: for thus he weakeneth the hands of the men of war that remain in this city, and the hands of all the people, in speaking such words unto them: for this man seeketh not the welfare of this people, but the hurt.

5 Then Zedekiah the king said, Behold, he is in your hand: for the king is not he that can do any thing against you.

6 Then took they Jeremiah, and cast him into the dungeon of Malchiah the son of Hammelech, that was in the court of the prison: and they let down Jeremiah with cords. And in the dungeon there was no water, but mire: so Jeremiah sunk in the mire.

7 Now when Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, one of the eunuchs which was in the king's house, heard that they had put Jeremiah in the dungeon; (the king then sitting in the gate of Benjamin;)

8 Ebed-melech went forth out of the king's house, and spake to the king, saying,

9 My lord the king, these men have done evil in all that they have done to Jeremiah the prophet, whom they have cast into the dungeon; and he is like to die for hunger in the place where he is: for there is no more bread in the city.

10 Then the king commanded Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying, Take from hence thirty men with thee, and take up Jeremiah the prophet out of the dungeon before he die.

11 So Ebed-melech took the men with him, and went into the house of the king under the treasury, and took thence old cast clouts, and old rotten rags, and let them down by cords into the dungeon to Jeremiah.

12 And Ebed-melech the Ethiopian said unto Jeremiah, Put now these old to favour his servants as much as he sees good: yet they who would be faithful to him, must prepare for enduring hardship and tribulation in this evil world.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1—6. Some of these persons were sent by Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to inquire concerning the event of the siege, and to desire his prayers. (Notes, xxi. 1—10. xxxvii. 6—10.) Jeremiah, though confined in the court of the prison, continued to prophesy; and they who had access to him dispersed his predictions throughout the city. This greatly offended the princes, who determined to defend themselves to the last extremity; and they resolved to put him to death. In order to this they represented him to the king, as an enemy to his people, who intentionally sought their hurt; though his labours, sufferings, tears, and supplications, abundantly proved his fervent love to them: and Zedekiah (who seems to have been a prince of slender capacity, and who was greatly in the power of his nobles, by reason of his difficult circumstances;) would not venture any thing to protect him, but abjectly left him in the hands of his enemies. Having thus got his consent, the malicious princes without delay caused the prophet to be let down into a dungeon or pit, where he sank in the mire, and must soon miserably have perished. Probably they intended to have then given out that he died in prison; and perhaps this dungeon was prepared for such silent executions. 'Some think that when he was in this dismal place, he made those mournful meditations, which are set down in the third chapter of the Lamentations.' (Louth.)—Hammelech signifies the king: the dungeon seems to have belonged to one of Zedekiah's sons.

cast clouts and rotten rags under thine arm-holes, under the cords. And Jeremiah did so.

13 So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: ² and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

14 ¶ Then Zedekiah the king ^a sent, and took Jeremiah the prophet unto him into the ^{*} third entry that is in the house of the LORD: and the king said unto Jeremiah, ^b I will ask thee a thing; hide nothing from me.

15 Then Jeremiah said unto Zedekiah, If I declare it unto thee, ^c wilt thou not surely put me to death? and if I give thee counsel, wilt thou not hearken unto me?

16 So Zedekiah the king ^d sware secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the LORD liveth, ^e that made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand ^f of these men that seek thy life.

17 Then said Jeremiah unto Zedekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel, ^g If thou wilt assuredly go forth unto the king of Babylon's princes, then thy soul shall live, and this city shall not be burned with fire; and thou shalt live, and thine house.

18 But ^h if thou wilt not go forth to the king of Babylon's princes, ⁱ then shall this city be given into the hand of the Chaldeans, and they shall burn it with fire, and thou shalt not escape out of their hand.

19 And Zedekiah the king said unto Jeremiah, ^j I am afraid of the Jews that are fallen to the Chaldeans, lest they deliver me into their hand, and they ^k mock me.

20 But Jeremiah said, They shall not deliver thee. ^m Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the LORD, which I speak unto thee: so it shall be well unto thee, and thy soul shall live.

21 But ⁿ if thou refuse to go forth, ^o this is the word that the LORD hath shewed me:

22 And, behold, ^p all the women that are left in the king of Judah's house, shall be brought forth to the king of Babylon's princes, and those women shall say, ^q Thy friends ^r have set thee on, and have prevailed against thee, ^t thy feet

V. 7.—13. We have here an example of fortitude and active kindness as noble, as the conduct of the princes was base and disingenuous. Ebed-melech, a Cushite, a stranger, probably a negro, whose name seems to imply that he had been the king's slave, though now preferred, was employed to deliver the prophet, and to shame the Jews. Hearing that Jeremiah had been cast into the dungeon; without hesitation or delay, and without fearing the wrath of the nobles, he boldly went to Zedekiah, when engaged in public business; and plainly told him, that they had done evil, in acting so cruelly towards the prophet of God; and that he must soon perish for hunger in the dungeon: (for perhaps he was not aware that he must have been suffocated with the mire, or destroyed by the exhalations of so noisome a cavern.) By this representation he obtained from the king a commission to rescue Jeremiah, and a guard to protect him in this service, which he performed with great promptitude and tenderness; and thus saved a most valuable life, though not without the hazard of his own.

To die for, &c. They needed not to have put him into the dungeon; he would have died of hunger, without adding the cruelty of that punishment; "for there is, &c." (Lowth.)—This, however, does not seem to be the obvious meaning of the words: and perhaps Ebed-melech was not aware what a dreadful place the dungeon was; but was fully assured that the prophet, being confined and out of sight, would perish by hunger, for none would carry him any food, when the famine in the city was extreme,

V. 15, 16. Jeremiah could not but consider Zedekiah as concerned in the cruelty with which he had been treated; yet he made no complaints. He was not, however, forward to repeat those warnings and counsels, which seemed only to endanger his own life, and to increase the guilt of the king. The prophet had such experience of the unsteadiness of the king's temper, of his backwardness in following good counsel, and want of courage to stand by those that advised him well, that he might with good reason resolve not to venture his life, to serve a man that was, in ... manner, incapable of being directed. (Lowth.) It does not appear, that he was charged with any message at this time to Zedekiah; though informed of the will of God respecting him. The questions proposed by the prophet implied, that he required Zedekiah to promise not to put him to death, and that he would follow his counsel, as the condition of his declaring the word of God. Some read the last without an interrogation; "Thou wilt not hearken to me." The king, however, made no promise of complying with his counsel; but he engaged with a solemn oath, by the living JEHOVAH, the Giver of their lives and souls, that he would neither put him to death, nor leave him in the hands of his enemies.

V. 19. Mock me. Zedekiah was conscious that he had acted basely, in violating his oath to the king of Babylon; and that he was considered by many of the Jews as having brought ruin and infamy on his country by his impolitic measures.

24 Then said Zedekiah unto Jeremiah, Let no man know of these words, and thou shalt not die.

25 But if ^t the princes hear that I have talked with thee, and they come unto thee, and say unto thee, Declare unto us now what thou hast said unto the king, hide it not from us, and we will not put 27 Then came all the princes unto Jeremiah, and asked him: ^x and he told them according to all these words that the king had commanded. So they [†] left off speaking with him; for the matter was not perceived.

V. 20—23. The prophet could not alter his message; and if Zedekiah feared the contempt of man more than the wrath of God, he must take the consequence. The Lord, however, assured him, that this evil should not come on him; but on the contrary, that he should meet with kind usage and preserve his life. But if he refused to comply with this humiliating counsel, he must be previously informed, that the women of his household, being delivered up to the princes of Babylon, would certainly upbraid him in his calamities, for trusting to his friends; who having seduced him from his allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, and engaged him in the unequal contest, had prevailed against him to his ruin; and having entangled him in inextricable difficulties, as if his feet sunk in the mire, had left him to his doom, and turned back from him to secure themselves. Thus his wives and children would fall into the hands of the enraged conquerors, and all the cruelty inflicted on them, as well as his own miseries, and the burning of the city and temple would be the effect of his obstinacy; as he might have prevented them, by submitting to the Chaldeans.

V. 24—28. Zedekiah would not follow the prophet's advice: nay, he even seems to have hesitated as to his oath of protecting him, and to have substituted for it a conditional promise. He was slavishly afraid of the princes. He supposed that they would certainly hear of this interview; and he proposed to him to inform them, that he had petitioned the king not to send him again to the dungeon in Jonathan's house. (Note, xxxvii. 15, 16.) As this was truth, and as the princes had no right to be informed of all that had passed, Jeremiah complied, and was thus preserved in the court of the prison till the city was taken. This seems to have been his last interview with Zedekiah.—What a view do these verses give of the extreme wickedness and impiety prevalent in Judah, especially in the superior orders!—Whatever was proposed to this most eminent and excellent servant of God and friend to his people, by either the king or his nobles; the highest recompense, was a promise that he should not be put to death! A promise, which could not in the smallest degree be depended on.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Nothing but close confinement or death can totally silence the zealous servant of God: whatever he suffers or fears, he cannot but declare his message, as he hath opportunity; and he cannot consent to any alteration or compromise respecting it. Submission to Providence, and to those who obtain the pre-eminence, is very contrary to the proud heart of man. But though liberty is very valuable, and worthy to be preserved at a great price, yet we must not rebel against God, or throw away our lives, if he please to permit us to be deprived of it.—They who point out to men the only way of safety and happiness, and who spend themselves, in the most disinterested manner, to promote their present and future welfare, must expect to be deemed enemies, and worthy of death, for declaring the whole truth! Doubtless their counsels and warnings tend to weaken the hands of those who fight against God: their words run counter to the projects and lusts, and are uneasy to the consciences, of ungodly men; and therefore they conclude that they seek the hurt, and not the welfare, of the people. Thus the wicked, when armed with power, are pushed forward to persecution; while they who secretly favour them, often do not think it worth while to risk any thing for their protection. Man's cruel ingenuity has invented various methods of torture and destruction; and persecutors have always been most remarkable for refinement in cruelty. Besides the numbers who have been openly tortured and put to death, it will never be known how many servants of God have privately been dispatched, till "the earth shall disclose her blood, and no more cover her slain." But till the "witnesses" "have finished their testimony," the malice of their enemies must be frustrated: for God will raise up instruments for their protection, where they might have been least expected. Equity, humanity, piety, and zealous boldness, in a good cause, have been found in persons of every climate, complexion, or rank in life: and the Lord often chooses those, who by birth, education, and outward circumstances, labour under peculiar disadvantages; in order to shame the conduct of degenerate professors. Even the retirements, or engagements, of princes should be interrupted, to prevent the shedding of innocent blood. In such a cause, we should neither fear the displeasure of man, nor any personal consequence; for where so great evil is about to be done, decided plain language is becoming, though the greatest princes be the perpetrators of the mischief. They who use their influence in the fear of God, to prevent injustice, oppression, or murder, may expect that he will protect and prosper them: and those timid tempers, which are easily seduced into sinful compliances, may often be as easily engaged by firm expostulation, to retract, and to prevent the consequences. Promptitude and tenderness should always concur in our efforts to relieve the distressed; and the manner of showing kindness is sometimes as expressive and as agreeable, as the favour itself.

The man of God must never yield to resentment, or suffer himself to be overcome of evil: he must ever be ready to give good counsel, and to promote the salvation of those who have most deeply injured him: he ought to do any thing to win upon them, except flattering them or offending his Lord. It is not always necessary to exasperate proud men, by repeated warnings, which they have often heard in vain. It may be proper to appeal to their consciences, whether they be not determined against doing the will of God, though they pretend to inquire after it? And it may sometimes be prudent to require of them promises, that they will not resent or punish us for what is spoken. Yet, if any relenting appear, and there be even a distant hope of succeeding, we should not be too anxious about our own safety; but declare the whole counsel of God, and leave the event with him. Whilst men have any some general convictions, and not a steady realizing faith, they will be unstable in all their ways. The fear of reproach will preponderate against the fear of almighty God: and every trifle will induce them to refuse that obedience, which alone can ensure their welfare and the life of their souls. Thus men treat faithful monitors as enemies, and flattering sycophants as bosom-friends, and bring on themselves by disobedience the very evils they dreaded from obedience; till their feet sink in the mire, their selfish friends forsake them, and they involve their families and connexions with them in inevitable destruction. But when ministers faithfully counsel and warn powerful ungodly men, they may consider themselves as highly favoured, if they be not put to death, or delivered up to the will of their enemies. The less men fear God, the more they fear their fellow creatures; and often they dare not act according to their own judgments, consciences, or inclinations, lest they should be censured by their own servants! We are not, however, bound to speak all we know to gratify our enemies, when no good end can be answered: and a partial evasive answer, if not contrary to truth, is sufficient for an impertinent and malicious inquiry. We have then need to be "wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

CHAP. XL.

Jeremiah, being dismissed by the Chaldeans, returns to Gedaliah, 1—6. The fugitive Jews resort to Gedaliah, who encourages them to cultivate the land, 7—12. Johanan, discovering a plot against Gedaliah, is not believed, 13—16.

THE word which came to Jeremiah from the LORD, ^a after that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had let him go from ^b Ramah, when he had taken him, being bound in * chains, among all that were carried away captive of Jerusalem and Judah, which were carried away captive unto Babylon.

2 And the captain of the guard took Jeremiah, and said unto him, ^c The LORD thy God hath pronounced this evil upon this place.

3 Now the LORD hath brought it, and done according as he hath said: ^d because ye have sinned against the LORD, and have not obeyed his voice, therefore this thing is come upon you.

4 And now, Behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which † were upon thine hand. If it seem good unto thee to come with me into Babylon, come; and I will ‡ look well unto thee: but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear: behold, ^e all the land is before thee: whither it seemeth good and convenient for thee to go, thither go.

5 Now while he was not yet gone back, he said, ¶ Go back also to Gedaliah the son of ^g Ahikam the son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon hath made governor over the cities of Judah, and dwell with him among the people: ^h or go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee to go. So the captain of the guard ⁱ gave him victuals and a reward, and let him go.

6 Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to ^k Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.

7 ¶ Now when ^l all the captains of the forces which were in the fields, even they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam governor in the land, and had committed unto him men, and women, and children; and of ^m the poor of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon;

9 And Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan ^s sware unto them, and to their men, saying, ^t Fear not to serve the Chaldeans: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you.

10 As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mizpah, to ^u serve the Chaldeans which will come unto us: but ye, ^v gather ye wine, and ^w summer-fruits, and oil, and put ^x them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken.

gives encouragement to his people, according to their perils, fears, and trials; and will never suffer those to be confounded or perish who trust in his mercy and obey his commandments. And if it be a great favour for those, who live in perilous times, to have their life given them for a prey; what cause shall we have for gratitude, if we escape the temptations, and are carried through the trials, of this evil world, and finally obtain the eternal salvation of our souls!

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1. The word, &c. This is rather the title of the subsequent part of the book, than of what follows in this chapter, which is wholly historical. It seems that Jeremiah, after he had been freed from prison, continued among the Jews, till he was bound with others of them, and carried to Ramah; and that he was there again set at liberty, in the manner here related.

V. 2, 3. The Jews were so blinded, that they could not see, or would not acknowledge, the hand of God in these events, or that they were the punishment of their sins. But this Gentile evidently perceived it: and perhaps he thought, that this justified all the violence and cruelty which he and the Chaldeans had committed.

V. 6. It is doubtful whether Jeremiah acted prudently in this decision: the event seems to indicate the contrary. He had received no intimations from God, that the Jews should prosper again in their own land, till seventy years were expired. But he was influenced by love to the promised land and to the remnant of his people; and he preferred the hopes of doing them good, to any favour that could have been shown him in Babylon.

v xxiv. 9. Is xvi.

11 Likewise when ^v all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the Ammonites, and in Edom, and that were in all the countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant of Judah, and that he had set over them Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan ;

12 Even all the Jews returned out of all places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mizpah, and gathered wine and summer-fruits very much.

13 ¶ Moreover ^z Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were in the fields, came to Gedaliah to Mizpah,

14 And said unto him, Dost thou certainly know, that Baalis the king of the Ammonites hath sent ^b Ishmael the son of Nethaniah to *slay thee? But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam ^c believed them not.

15 Then Johanan the son of Kareah spake to Gedaliah in Mizpah secretly, saying, ^a Let me go, I pray thee, and I will slay Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and no man shall know it ; ^e wherefore should he slay thee, that all the Jews which are gathered unto thee should be scattered, and the remnant of Judah perish !

16 But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam said unto Johanan the son of Kareah, ^f Thou shalt not do this thing : for thou speakest falsely of Ishmael.

V. 7-12. (xxvi. 24.) Perhaps Gedaliah had before surrendered to the Chaldeans ; or by some services, or his general character for integrity and capacity, he had recommended himself to the confidence of the victors. It was not their intention entirely to desolate the land : and therefore they wished to induce the poor remains of the Jews to settle there ; as they feared no further resistance, now Jerusalem lay in ruins, and their rulers and nobles were either slain or made captives. They therefore placed Gedaliah over them, to encourage them to settle and cultivate their lands. Accordingly he fixed his residence at Mizpah : and many of those, who had commanded bodies of troops in different parts of the land, and who had fled into the adjacent countries, now repaired to Gedaliah, with some hopes of enjoying peace and acquiring a settlement. Gedaliah seems to have been an upright man and a cordial friend to his people, and well approved by them. (Marg. Ref.) He encouraged them to expect protection from the Chaldeans, whilst they continued in quiet subjection : he engaged with a solemn oath not to injure or oppress them, but to do them all the service in his power : and he excited them to make all the provision they could for their wants, by collecting such of the fruits of the earth as had escaped the ravages of war. Accordingly their numbers increased ; they found great abundance of provisions ; and they had a fair prospect of again prospering, had not their unrepented wickedness entailed divine judgments on them.

—Serve. (10.) Or stand before the Chaldeans, as a mediator.

V. 13-16. Johanan and his companions seem to have acted honestly in this affair. They had received certain intelligence of the plot formed against Gedaliah's life, and consequently against the whole new settlement. Ishmael, (whose very name seemed hostile to Israel,) being a branch of David's family, was perhaps displeased that another was preferred above him. And the king of the Ammonites, (as it seems, out of hatred to the Jews,) employed him to slay Gedaliah. But Gedaliah meaning honestly, was too unsuspecting : and as Johanan proposed a violent method of defeating Ishmael's design, it is probable that he considered the information as malicious. Yet he certainly ought to have examined into the evidence, and to have confined Ishmael ; or to have taken some precautions for his own safety, on which that of the people so much depended. But he was left to this indiscretion, that judgment might come to the uttermost on this incorrigible remnant of Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Many can see the justice of God's judgments, and the truth of his words, in the case of others, who are heedless or blind as to those things which relate to themselves. Nay, some can plead the prophecies, in vindication of their own cruel oppressions, and think themselves justified, because the scripture is fulfilled ; though it was equally fulfilled by the treachery of Judas and the malice of those who crucified Christ ! None, however, are so hardened as apostate professors of religion. It is allowable for faithful ministers to receive the proffered kindness even of ungodly men, when it can be done without appearance of selfishness ; when it does not tend to deceive the giver ; and when it is not to be purchased or repaid by any sinful compliances or flatteries. Nay, their counsel may be often taken in secular matters : for they are "wise in their generation." They who earnestly desire the salvation of sinners and the prosperity of the church, are apt to take encouragement, from transient appearances, to expect better times : and they prefer the hope of being useful, to the most secure and profitable situations, in which they would be shut out from God's ordinances, and waste their lives to no purpose. After heavy calamities, men might obtain peace and comfort, if they would but submit to Providence, and to those placed over them ; if they accommodated themselves to their circumstances, and applied themselves with diligence, quietness, and honesty, to the duties of their station ; and, especially, if they did but repent of their sins, and seek peace with God and protection from him. But his wrath pursueth the impenitent into every place and condition : and whilst pride, ambition, avarice, or revenge, bear rule, men will form new projects, and be restless in mischief, which commonly ends in their own ruin and that of others. Advancement above such as were equals or superiors always excites envy and opposition; and no equity, kindness, or services, can afford security from the assaults of turbulent enmity and disappointed ambition.—When men mean well, they are often too free from suspicion: and even information and good counsel, when given with violence and connected with unjustifiable proposals, will often be rejected by conscientious persons. We have, however, need to be wise as serpents, as well as harmless as doves; not only for our own preservation, but to prevent “one sinner from destroying much good.” But we should especially learn to trust in God alone; as the most powerful earthly protectors cannot secure us from the base designs of even very mean and inconsiderable enemies.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. Seventh, &c. Three months after the temple was destroyed. The fast in the seventh month was observed in remembrance of the murder of Gedaliah. (Marg. Ref)

—Princes. (Some of the chief officers belonging to Zedekiah. xxxvi. 12.) These brought a great number of others with them as their retinue; or else they could not have made such destruction as they did. (Louth.)—These “princes of the king” might join with Ishmael, from hatred to the Chaldeans, as well as envy of Gedaliah.

V. 2, 3. Gedaliah was evidently imprudent in taking no precaution against a person, whom he had great reason to suspect, both as a rival, and on account of the caution which Johanan had given him: but his unsuspecting generosity aggravated the baseness of Ishmael’s conduct. Had not the other captains been infatuated, either by envy, resentment, or by a selfish regard to their private concerns, they would have been more careful in defending a life on which the safety of the whole company so greatly depended.—Ishmael, by coming to Gedaliah, had virtually submitted to his authority and claimed his protection; and he was at this time, along with his friends, hospitably entertained by Gedaliah. Yet he slew all that joined with Gedaliah in opposing him: for several of the commanders, as well as the greatest part of the people, were still left alive, as it appears by the sequel. (Louth.) Many of these, however, seem to have been absent from Mizpah at this time, gathering in the fruits of the earth, or attending to their private concerns; so that all present, that stood out in resistance, seem to have been slain; and the rest kept in close confinement, that the transaction might be concealed, till Ishmael had completed his designs.

V. 4—8. The care which had been taken to conceal the murder of Gedaliah, &c. gave Ishmael an opportunity of still further increasing the number and atrocity of his crimes. The places here mentioned had belonged to the kingdom of Israel; but they lay not far from Mizpah; and it is probable, that these men were Jews, who had resorted to Gedaliah, and confiding in his protection, had fixed their residence in different places, in order to gather in the fruits of the earth. They expressed their grief for the calamities of the nation, by some observances which 9 Now the pit wherein Ishmael had cast all the dead bodies of the men, whom he had slain * because of Gedaliah, was it which * Asa the king had made, * for fear of Baasha king of Israel: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah filled it with them that were slain.

10 Then Ishmael carried away captive * all the residue of the people that were in Mizpah, * even the king's daughters, and all the people that remained in Mizpah, whom Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had committed to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah carried them away captive, and departed to go over * to the Ammonites.

11 ¶ But when * Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, heard of all the evil that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had done, 12 Then they took all the men, and went * to fight with Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and found him by * the great waters that are in Gibeon.

13 Now it came to pass, that when all the people, which were with Ishmael, saw Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, then they were glad.

14 So all the people that Ishmael had carried away captive from Mizpah cast about and returned, and went unto Johanan the son of Kareah.

15 But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah * escaped from Johanan with * eight men, and went to the Ammonites.

16 Then took Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, all the remnant of the people, whom he had recovered from Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, from Mizpah, (after that he had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam,) * even mighty men of war, and the women, and the children, and the eunuchs, whom he had brought again from Gibeon:

17 And they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of * Chimham, which is by Bethlehem, † to go to enter into Egypt, 18 Because of the Chaldeans: * for they were afraid of them, Because Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, * whom the king of Babylon made governor in the land.

were forbidden in the law, on funeral occasions; (Marg. Ref.) but which were customary, and perhaps counted allowable, in seasons of public calamity. Some think, that Gedaliah, after the destruction of the temple, had erected an altar, and appointed a temporary place of worship at Mizpah, to which they purposed to carry their offerings; but it is more likely, that they meant to show their regard to the ruins of the temple, and there to offer their oblations, as well as the circumstances would admit.—The hypocrisy of Ishmael, in pretending to share their sorrows, and inviting them to see Gedaliah; and then murdering a company of men who gave him no provocation, without sparing any but those who appealed to his avarice, when added to his other crimes, constituted a complication of atrocious wickedness, which has scarcely ever been exceeded. Perhaps he hoped at first to have won them over to his party; but perceiving their attachment to Gedaliah, he thus wreaked his vengeance on them.

V. 9. Pit. Asa fortified Mizpah; and in doing this, he would make trenches as well as ramparts: but perhaps this pit was some hiding-place, which he prepared for security, in case Baasha should suddenly assault him. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes. 2 Chr. xvi.)

V. 10. Perhaps Ishmael had at first hoped that the Jews would have joined him: and that by the help of the king of Ammon, he should be able to make a stand against the Chaldeans, who had withdrawn most of their forces from that neighbourhood. But he now despaired of success in that way; and proceeded to carry the whole unarmed multitude captive into the land of Ammon. Among them, it seems, there were some daughters of king Zedekiah, who had been left to the care of Gedaliah, when his sons were slain; and these, being recovered from Ishmael by Johanan, went down with him into Egypt, and seem to have perished there with the other Jews.

V. 11-15. Johanan seems to have been employed, at a distance from Gedaliah: so that it was some time before he heard tidings of these tragical events. But when he was informed of them, he immediately pursued Ishmael, who had not courage to face him; and being left by those whom he had detained as prisoners, he escaped the avenging sword of Johanan. Ishmael came to Gedaliah with ten men, who are supposed to have been princes of Judah, with their retinues: but he fled with only eight men. Perhaps the others had before left him, or had lost their lives in these bloody transactions: and, if they had retainers, these might think it safer to join Johanan, than to accompany Ishmael in his flight.

V. 16-18. Johanan had hitherto acted right: and it was proper that he should assume the command, till the king of Babylon had been informed. But he and the other princes, having taken a decided part against Ishmael, had no sufficient reason to fear lest the Chaldeans would revenge the murder of Gedaliah on them. Perhaps Joha-

3 That the LORD thy God g may shew us the way wherein we may walk, and the thing that we may do.

5 Then they said to Jeremiah, l The LORD be a true and faithful witness between us, m if we do not even according to all things, for the which the LORD thy God shall send thee to us.

6 Whether n it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the LORD our God, to whom we send thee : o that it may be well with us, when we obey the voice of the LORD our God.

nan had no mind to be superseded in the command ; and so used his influence to induce the whole company to take refuge in Egypt ; and their old attachment to the Egyptians rendered them the more ready to concur in this ruinous measure. "The habitation of Chimham" seems to have been a residence and estate, which David had settled on Chimham the son of Barzillai, out of his own patrimony. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When God is provoked to leave men to themselves and to the temptations of Satan, they are hurried on into every kind of wickedness ; their impetuous passions burst through all restraints, and misery and destruction attend their ways. While divine judgments are executing on guilty nations, the best men are often first cut off, for the punishment of the survivors. Candour and generosity frequently expose men to base designs of those wretches, who are of their father the devil, and closely copy his example of subtlety, malice, and murder. They, who hate the worshippers of God, can assume the appearance of piety and love, that they may better accomplish their purposes ; and the thirst for blood, like other depraved appetites, becomes more insatiable by every gratification, until men delight in murder for its own sake. It is sometimes well for mankind, that one selfish passion restrains another in the conduct of those who are not influenced by a better motive. Thus avarice checks the progress of cruelty ; ambition and pride that of licentiousness ; the love of licentious pleasures that of avarice, ambition, and revenge ; and the fear of consequences restrains all the other selfish passions. By these and such like means the Lord bounds and over-rules the wickedness of ungodly men ; and provides for the accomplishment of his own wise designs, whether of judgment or of mercy. As death in such varied forms meets men in those places where they least expect it, we should continually inquire, whether we be in such a state and frame of mind, as we should wish to be found in when called to appear before our Judge? And as men readily give all their substance to ransom their lives, how ready should we be to forsake all for the salvation of our souls! If our hearts delight in the ordinances of God, and are disposed to sympathize in the afflictions of his people, and to regard the interests of true religion as our interests, death can do us no harm ; but will remove us to that happy place, where all tears will be wiped from our eyes. They who are most savage in their cruelty to those that are not prepared to resist them, are often most cowardly when vigorously opposed. The success of villainy must be short lived ; and though base murderers and traitors may for a time escape vengeance, yet evil pursueth, and will certainly overtake them. But how soon may our most promising appearances of worldly prosperity vanish as a dream! And how impossible is it, that any can prosper, who harden their hearts against God! The removal of a prudent, peaceable, and equitable ruler, and the succession of another, who is rash, turbulent, and enterprising, may affect the condition of vast multitudes ; so entirely do we in every thing depend on the providence of God! When men's hearts are fixed on worldly projects and connexions, they will soon pretend or fancy some motive or reason for following their inclinations. And if the fear of man sometimes restrains from evil, it more frequently leads to rebellion and impiety. But they only are happy and steady, who fear the Lord, and walk in his ways.

they wanted to have his sanction to their purpose of going to Egypt. In order to induce him to favour them, they applied to him with one consent, and in the most respectful and plausible manner: they used language suited to prepossess him with a favourable opinion of them, and to move his compassion; and they entreated his prayers in their behalf, and that he would inquire of the Lord what he would have them to do. The prophet readily acquiesced; and doubted not but he should receive an answer from God, which he would unreservedly declare to them. And they called the Lord to witness, that they would implicitly follow his directions, whatever they were, that it might be well with them. When they said, "Whether it be good, or whether it be bad," they used language, which implied, that they supposed Jeremiah would answer according to his own discretion, rather than that he would deliver the unerring counsel of God. 'It is the constant method of hypocrites, to pretend a profound submission to the will of God, till that comes to cross their inclinations or interest.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. The prophet waited for a revelation from God in answer to the inquiries of the people, who saw good to delay for some time to make known his will: perhaps to show them, that Jeremiah did not speak of his own mind, but when, and as he was directed. The delay was also suited to give time for consideration, and to retard the execution of their rash projects: and as it would render them impatient, it tended to detect their hypocrisy, and to show more clearly their determined rebellion against God.

V. 10. I repent, &c. The Lord was ready to alter his conduct towards the people, provided they would obey his voice. He delighted not in their miseries, but was ready to terminate them, as soon as it could consist with his justice and the honour of his name. 'God is said to repent, when he alters the outward methods of his providence. The punishment, which the Jews had received, had made satisfaction to his justice, as far as concerns this world; and he would not continue the same severity, unless they gave him a new provocation.' (Lowth.)

V. 13. 'I will incline the king of Babylon to take pity on you; and so settle you in your own country.' (Lowth.) He should cause them to return to their cities and inheritances; and not live in that unsettled manner which they then did.

V. 14-17. 'Thus God turneth the policy of the wicked to their own destruction: for they thought themselves safe in Egypt; and there Nebuchadrezzar destroyed them and the Egyptians.'

V. 18. The people had witnessed the tremendous effects of the wrath of God, in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem: and had they not been past feeling, this denunciation must have made their ears to tingle, and appalled their very souls. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—22. God made known to the prophet the dissimulation of the princes and people; and their conduct when he delivered his message, seems to have indicated a determination to disobey it. He did not therefore shun to charge the matter home on their consciences, and to denounce the awful judgments of God against them; though they had shown him much respect, and had him entirely in their power.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Numbers have a general persuasion, that the instructions given them from the word of God are right and good; but they do not so decidedly believe them, as to yield obedience, when self-denial is requisite: yet they wish faithful ministers to sanction their measures, and in urgent cases desire an interest in their prayers. Many of them learn the language of piety, and can upon occasion use it very plausibly: they pretend great respect for the servants of God, and become their supplicants, for their own selfish purposes; they impose upon them, and recommend themselves to their compassion and good will; and make them think, that they desire to “know the way in which they “should walk, and the thing that they should do.” There is, however, no harm done, if ministers entertain better hopes of men than they deserve; provided they be only induced to pray for them, and to declare the word of God without reserve or discouragement: for they should on all occasions be ready to do this for every one, whether great or small. But many, who promise with great solemnity to do whatever the Lord requires, whilst they can hope to have their pride flattered, and their favourite inclinations gratified, cannot endure to be contradicted or called to exercise self-denial: and generally something in the language of such persons betrays the state of their hearts to those who have “their senses exercised to discern good “and evil.” For how could men, if they were not greatly attached to their own wills, suppose that the Lord would require of them any thing evil in itself, or prejudicial to them? All his commands are holy, just, and good, however they may thwart our inclinations: and not only will it be well with us at last, if we obey the voice of the Lord our God, but “in keeping of his precepts “there is great reward.” They that would know the mind of God in doubtful cases, must wait as well as pray. He that believeth will not be hasty, but will stay till he is satisfied, or obliged to decide: but unbelief and self-will are impatient; and the Lord often delays to answer prayer, that he may distinguish betwixt the humble believer, who must wait at mercy's door till it be opened; and the pretender, who (like Saul) will soon apply elsewhere, if he find not the encouragement and success that he expected. It is as vain as impious, to attempt imposing upon God. He will, however, always give encouragement to sinners, who apply for it in his appointed way. He is ever ready to return in mercy to those whom he hath afflicted, and to pardon the penitent; for he delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live: and he never rejects those who rely on his promises and obey his commandments. Whatever loss or suffering we may sustain from obedience, it is provided against in his word; and he hath engaged to protect and deliver all who trust and serve him. But if men will not abide in his counsel, nor obey his voice; if they will lean to their own understandings, instead of trusting in his guidance; if they will expect security from trouble and danger by disobedience, and obstinately pursue their carnal projects: either the evils they feared, or far worse, will come upon them, from which they will not be able to escape. And they, who copy the crimes of those on whom the anger and fury of the Lord hath been poured out, will in their turn also be made an execration, an astonishment, a curse, and a reproach. These things must be urged on the consciences of men, without respect of persons: nor must the servants of God shun to declare his counsel, out of regard to their rank, fear of their frown, or even gratitude for the favours conferred on themselves. But no sinners should be rebuked with such sharpness, as they who have dissembled with God in their solemn professions and inquiries after his will. This will appear in their conduct, for actions speak more plainly than words: and when it is thus made manifest, that they will not obey the voice of God, they must be plainly told that his wrath abideth on them.

LORD their God, for which the LORD their God had sent him to them, even all these words,

2 Then spake Azariah the son of Hoshaiah, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the proud men, saying unto Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely: the LORD our God hath not sent thee to say, Go not out to Egypt to sojourn there:

3 But Baruch the son of Neriah setteth thee on against us, for to deliver us into the hand of the Chaldeans, that they might put us to death, and carry us away captives into Babylon.

4 So Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, and all the people, obeyed not the voice of the LORD, to dwell in the land of Judah;

5 But Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, took all the remnant of Judah, that were returned from all nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah;

6 Even men, and women, and children, and the king's daughters, and every person that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had left with Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, and Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch the son of Neriah.

7 So they came into the land of Egypt: for they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: thus came they even to Tahpanhes.

8 ¶ Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, saying,

9 Take great stones in thine hand, and hide them in the clay in the brick-kiln, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of Judah;

10 And say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid; and he shall spread his royal pavilion over them.

11 And when he cometh he shall smite the land of Egypt; and deliver such as are for death to death; and such as are for captivity to captivity; and such as are for the sword to the sword.

12 And I will kindle a fire in the houses of the gods of Egypt; and he shall burn them, and carry them away captives; and he shall array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment; and he shall go forth from thence in peace:

13 He shall break also the images of Bethshemesh, that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall be burn with fire.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 2, 3. Azariah, called Jezaniah. (xlii. 1.)

Proud men. Who refused to obey almighty God, when his command crossed their inclinations.

—Hath not spoken. The constant method of hypocrites and infidels, who pretend that they are not satisfied of the truth of divine revelation; when the true cause of their unbelief is; that God's commands contradict their own lusts and appetites.

Baruch. They would not directly accuse Jeremiah; —but they lay the blame on Baruch. (Louth.) The princes had previously made up their minds, at all events, to go into Egypt; and therefore they were of course decidedly averse to Jeremiah's counsel, because proudly attached to their own will and wisdom; and doubtless they were also exasperated by his severe language and awful warnings. They were not, however, willing to allow, that they acted in direct defiance of God's authority; they pretended, therefore, and perhaps persuaded themselves, that Jeremiah was influenced by Baruch to oppose their projects, that they might fall into the hands of the Chaldeans.

Their suspicions of Baruch were doubtless ill-grounded; for he was a very pious man, and a steady friend to his people; but Jeremiah's character was so established, he had so long shown a patient disinterested love to his nation, and so many of his predictions had already been fulfilled; that their accusation of him was as foolish as it was malicious. His late preference of a lot among them, to the favour of the king and princes of Babylon, was alone a sufficient confutation of the slander.

V. 5—7. Johanan and the captains and soldiers seem to have compelled the people in general, as well as Jeremiah and Baruch, to accompany them into Egypt. This aggravated their impiety and rebellion; as they carried away those into that idolatrous country, (which had always proved treacherous to Israel,) who had returned from other nations out of affection to the land of Judah. When they arrived in Egypt, they repaired immediately to the royal city, where, it is probable, they were favourably received by Pharaoh.

V. 8—13. The Jews had sheltered themselves in Egypt, to be out of the reach of the Chaldeans: but they were no sooner arrived there, than the prophet was instructed to 5 But ^a they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear to turn from their wickedness, to ^b burn no incense unto other gods.

6 Wherefore ^a my fury and mine anger was poured forth, and was kindled in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem; and they are ^b wasted and desolate, as at this day.

7 Therefore now thus saith the Lord, the God of hosts, the God of Israel; Wherefore commit ye this great evil ^a against your souls, to cut off from you ^b man and woman, child ^c and suckling, out of ^d Judah, ^e to leave you none to remain;

8 In that ^a ye provoke me unto wrath with the works of your hands, burning incense unto other gods in the land of Egypt, whither ye be gone to dwell, ^b that ye might cut yourselves off, and that ye might be ^c a curse and a reproach among all the nations of the earth!

9 Have ^a ye forgotten the wickedness of your fathers, and the ^b wickedness of the kings of Judah, and the wickedness of their wives, and your own wickedness, and ^c the wickedness of your wives, which they have committed in the land of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem?

12 And ^a I will take the remnant of Judah, that have set their faces to go into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, and they shall all be consumed, and fall in the land of Egypt: they shall even be consumed by the sword and by the famine: they shall die, from the least even unto the greatest, by the sword and by the famine: ^b and they shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a curse, and a reproach.

13 For ^a I will punish them that dwell in the land of Egypt, as I have punished Jerusalem, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence:

14 So that none of the remnant of Judah, which are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall escape or remain, that they should return into the land of Judah, to the ^b which they have a desire to return to dwell there; ^c for none shall return but such as shall escape.

dered. "I pray you, do not that abominable thing which I hate." The language is peculiarly pathetic, as well as emphatical. (2 Cor. v. 20.)

V. 6. 'He setteth before their eyes God's judgments against Judah and Jerusalem for their idolatry; that they might beware by their example, and not with the like wickedness provoke the Lord.'

V. 9. 'We ought to keep in memory God's plagues, from the beginning; that, considering them, we might live in his fear: and know that if he spared not kings, princes, and rulers, or whole countries and nations, for their sins, we vile worms cannot look to escape punishment for ours.'

V. 12. Set their faces. 'They have fully set their minds, and are gone thither on purpose. Whereby he excepteth the innocent, as Jeremiah and Baruch, that were forced. Therefore the Lord showeth, that he will set his face against them; that is, purposely destroy them.'

V. 14. 'Scaliger observes, out of Eusebius, that Artaxerxes Ochus, making an expedition into Egypt, removed a considerable number of Jews out of that country, and carried them away as far as the Caspian sea, and there settled them. These, he thinks, were

'the remainder of those Jews that went down into Egypt at this time.' (Louth.) As, however, Ochus' conquest of Egypt did not occur till nearly three hundred years from the time of the Jews going into Egypt, this opinion is not very probable: nor do we read any thing more of this remnant, or of the fulfilment of this prediction.

None shall, &c. The Jews, when they went into Egypt, supposed, that they might more easily return into their land, than their brethren at Babylon could; and they had a desire of returning, provided they might but be secured from the Chaldeans. But the Lord declared that none of them should return thither, "but such as should escape;" which may mean such as should escape the contagion of idolatry; or a very mean and small remnant, escaping with immense difficulty from the general ruin. (23.) 'None shall return into the land of Judah, but such as shall speedily withdraw themselves out of Egypt, and make an escape from this wicked Johanan.' (Bp. Hall.) Perhaps some of the small remnant, who went into Egypt by compulsion, being preserved from idolatry, were afterwards restored, with their posterity, as "a remnant according to the election of grace," to their own land, when the Jews returned from Babylon.

15 ¶ Then[†] all the men, which knew that their wives had burned incense unto other gods, and all the women that stood by, a great multitude, even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah, saying,

16 As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the Lord, [†] we will not hearken unto thee.

17 But we will certainly do [†] whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the ^{*} queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, [†] as we have done, ye, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, [†] in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for [†] then had we plenty of [†] victuals, and were well, and saw no evil.

18 But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto her, [†] we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword, and by the famine.

19 And when [†] we burned incense to the queen of heaven, and poured out drink-offerings unto her, did we make her cakes to worship her, and pour out drink-offerings unto her, [†] without our [†] men?

20 Then Jeremiah said unto all the people, to the men, and to the women, and to all the people which had given him that answer, saying,

21 The incense that ye burned in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, ye, and your fathers, your kings, and your princes, and the people of the land, [†] did not the Lord remember them, and came it not into his mind?

22 So that the Lord [†] could no longer bear, because of the evils of your doings and because of the abominations which ye have committed; therefore is [†] your land a desolation, and an astonishment, and a curse, without an inhabitant, as at this day.

23 Because [†] ye have burned incense, and because ye have sinned against the Lord, and have not obeyed the voice of the Lord, nor walked in his law, nor in his statutes, nor in his testimonies; therefore this evil is happened unto you as at this day.

24 Moreover Jeremiah said unto all the people, and to all the women, [†] Hear the word of the Lord, [†] all Judah that are in the land of Egypt:

25 Thus saith the Lord of hosts the God of Israel, saying [†] Ye and your wives have both spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand, saying, [†] We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings

V. 15-18. The women had, it seems, been more active in idolatry than the men; yet the men were enraged at the prophet's rebuke, and were determined to justify what their wives had done. After many evasions and excuses for their disobedience, they at length spake out in the most impious manner, declaring that they would not regard the word, which the prophet had spoken to them in the name of God. Either they meant to treat Jeremiah as a false prophet; or they were avowed in infidelity and impiety: they thought the service of JEHOVAH unprofitable and ruinous, and were determined to have no more to do with it. They had vowed to burn incense to idols, and they would do that which had gone out of their mouth, (Marg. Ref.) This worship, they averred, had been of great antiquity and authority; for their fathers, and their kings and princes, had sanctioned it, not only in the cities of Judah, but in Jerusalem itself: when this worship was observed, they had prospered; but since it had been put down, all their miseries had come upon them. Nothing could be more irrational than this pretence: for the prophets, who had reprobated their idolatry, had also predicted their calamities; and they, who had favoured it, had promised them peace and prosperity. Indeed, the Lord had long borne with them, till at length their measure of iniquity was filled; and then he executed vengeance upon them, because they cleaved in heart to their idols, even when they had it not in their power to worship them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. This is supposed to have been the answer of the women, who took the prophet's rebuke to themselves, and were offended at him for it; (15;) and they pleaded, that they had not performed their worship without the knowledge and connivance of their husbands: yet as the masculine is used, it seems the men concurred in it. This [†] showeth how great danger it is for the husbands to permit their wives any thing, whereof they be not assured [†] by God's word; for thereby they take occasion to justify [†] their doings; and then husbands shall give an account [†] thereof before God.

V. 22. Could, &c. As men, when urged by repeated provocations, are no longer able to repress their anger, but it bursts forth most violently on the objects of their resentment: so the Lord could no longer endure the provocations of his people; but his honour required him to take vengeance on them, and then the effects of his indignation became very dreadful.

unto her: ye will surely accomplish your vows, and surely perform your vows.

26 Therefore hear ye the word of the LORD, all Judah that dwell in the land of Egypt; Behold, ^e I have sworn by my great name, saith the LORD, ^f that my name shall no more be named in the mouth of any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt, saying, ^g The LORD God liveth.

27 Behold, I ^h will watch over them for evil, and not for good; and all the men of Judah, that are in the land of Egypt, ⁱ shall be consumed by the sword and by the famine, until there be an end of them.

28 Yet ^k a small number that escape the sword shall return out of the land of

¹ Egypt into the land of Judah, and all the remnant of Judah, that are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall know whose word shall stand, ^{*} mine, or theirs.

29 And this shall be ^m a sign unto you, saith the LORD, that I will punish you in this place, that ye may know that my words shall surely stand against you for evil:

30 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, ⁿ I will give Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life, ^o as I gave Zedekiah king of Judah into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, his enemy, and that sought his life.

V. 25. 'They insist upon their unlawful vow, as an obligation in conscience which could not be dispensed with; just as Herod did on his unlawful oath.' (Matt. xiv. 9.) (Louth.)

V. 26. 'I have made a solemn vow in opposition to that wicked one of yours. I will consume them by a sudden and general destruction; and will deliver them up to impentence and apostasy.' (Louth.)

My name, &c. The Jews, amidst their idolatries, professed themselves the people of JEHOVAH, and would sometimes swear by his name; but he solemnly assured them that he would so destroy them that none of them should remain in the land of Egypt to dishonour his name by this hypocritical use of it. This must be understood of that rebellious company; for multitudes of Jews in after ages settled in Egypt, and openly professed and exercised their religion there.

V. 23. The word rendered that escape, is translated by the Septuagint by the same word which St. Luke uses, when speaking of the success of the Gospel. "The Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved," or the saved ones. (Note, 14.)

Shall know. 'Since they are so peremptory in abiding by their own vows and resolutions, they shall see whose word shall stand good, or take effect, mine or theirs.' (Louth.) The people rejected the Lord's word of warning, of precept, and of promise; but his word of threatening stood out against them, and would certainly be executed. They established their own word, by performing their rebellious purposes; but they would not find their words take place, with which they promised themselves, and each other, impunity and prosperity in their ungodliness. The event would in this respect show whose words would stand, the Lord's or theirs.

V. 29, 30. (Notes, xliii. 3—13.) Pharaoh-hophra, (called Apries by the Greek historians,) after long prosperity, which elated him with the most excessive pride and arrogance, was dethroned in an insurrection headed by Amasis, who succeeded him; and having concealed himself for a few years, he collected some forces, marched against Ama-sis, and gave him battle, in which being vanquished, and taken prisoner, he was strangled in his own palace. Thus he was "given into the hands of his enemies, and of those who sought his life," as Zedekiah had been. In the time which intervened between Pharaoh-hophra's being dethroned and his death, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt; and having made immense destruction of the inhabitants, and taken a prodigious booty, he came to terms with Amasis, confirmed him in the kingdom as his deputy, and returned to Babylon; whither he is supposed to have taken those Jews who survived the sword, or who were not slain by the enraged conqueror.—These events are computed to have occurred between the fourteenth and the nineteenth year of the captivity. (Notes, xli. 13—26. Ez. xxix. xxxii.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

We ought frequently to recollect the miseries which we have witnessed or heard of; seriously considering that the Lord hath brought them upon the sufferers, because of the wickedness which they committed to provoke him to anger. For sin is that abominable thing which he hateth; and every wilful transgression implies alienation of heart from him, as well as rebellion against him. But, though all our sorrows originate from this source, yet the most awful miseries, to which men are exposed, are occasioned by their neglect of his great salvation. For, after all that he hath done to open a new and living Way for sinners to return to him, the warnings, exhortations, and entreaties of his ministers often prove unavailing, and numbers remain unwilling to be reconciled unto God: they still persist in those abominable things which he hateth; they will not incline their ears or their hearts, to return to his worship and service; and their obstinate impentence and unbelief are evils committed against their own souls; their blood is upon their own heads, and they cut themselves off, and make themselves a curse and a reproach. To mingle idolatry with divine worship, and to reject the mediation of Christ, are far more provoking to God, and ruinous to men, than is generally supposed. They, who worship images, saints, and angels, and present oblations to the queen of heaven, should recollect the consequences of similar practices of God's ancient people, previous to the Babylonish captivity. And they, who neglect the person and mediation of the Son of God, should consider the punishment inflicted on the Jews for rejecting and crucifying him; under which they still continue a curse and a reproach among the nations; because they have not been humbled to this day, nor have feared the Lord to obey his command of honouring the Son, "even as they should honour the Father that sent him."

V. 15—30.

If men remember the wickedness of former ages only to imitate it, they may expect even severer punishment than that which ancient rebels suffered: for neither rank nor sex will protect the workers of iniquity. Such as neglect to use their authority to restrain their own households from wickedness, will be punished as accomplices in their crimes: yet their connivance will not excuse those, who were thus emboldened to commit impiety and vice. Men ought not to expect, that God will grant even their lawful desires, when they refuse obedience to his commands: and carnal projects which are contrary to his word, must end in wretched disappointment, however politic and plausible they may appear. The tendency of human depravity is from bad to worse, and sinners left to themselves grow continually more bold and insolent in their impiety. Reproofs exasperate those, whom they do not convince and humble. Multitudes show by their actions, that they will not hearken to the word of God; but will follow the devices and desires of their own evil hearts; and some dare to avow their purposes, and to say to the Almighty, Depart from us, we desire not the "knowledge of thy ways!" When sinners are thus hardened and blinded by Satan, they are seldom at a loss for arguments and excuses for their conduct: and whilst the long-suffering of God towards sinners, and his judgments upon hypocrites, can supply them with reasons for the most abominable wickedness, they can never be without some apology. But such perverse inferences from providential dispensations are as absurd as unscriptural: and they who know the truth and will of God, can easily prove, that all our miseries spring from sin; all our comforts and hopes from God's mercy; and that all our well-grounded persuasions of an interest in that mercy are connected with repentance and the obedience of faith. Indeed, ingenious infidels and ungodly men may perplex the plainest subjects. And they have been so numerous in all ages and places hitherto, and have possessed so much of the wealth, power, and wisdom of the world, that they have been able plausibly to plead antiquity, authority, and general consent, in support of their pernicious doctrines and vile abominations. Thus men encourage themselves and each other, to speak and act in direct defiance of the revealed will of God; to accomplish their iniquitous purposes; to vindicate what they have done: and to bear down the servants and worshippers of the Lord. But when we have borne testimony against them, and shown the folly, wickedness, and fatal consequences of their conduct, we must leave the matter to him. He will assuredly plead his own cause, and the event will show, whether the Scripture-threatenings, or their flimsy conjectures, will stand their ground. Nay, the punishment of those who have countenanced, encouraged, and abetted their rebellion and impiety, will be a sign unto them, that the Lord's word will stand against them for evil.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLV. V. 3. Baruch seems to have been a young man, when employed to read the roll in the temple; and though he was well disposed to the service of God, he had not sufficiently counted the cost. He had been grieved, to write and read of the many and great calamities, which were coming on his people: but when he was persecuted for it by Jehoiakim, he complained that the Lord added grief to his sorrow; and he was ready to faint with excess of disquietude and terror, from which he could find no rest.

V. 4, 5. This message, though inserted subsequent to the narrative of the destruction of Jerusalem, was sent to Baruch long before, at the time when his mind was greatly discomposed. Being a man of learning and ingenuity, it seems he had formed expectations of obtaining preferment, and was seeking great things for himself. He had perhaps hoped, that the predicted judgments would not happen in his time; and that by prudence and activity he should obtain the favour of his superiors. For this the Lord rebuked him. Dost thou aspire to honour and dignity, in a time of common calamity? Loath God was about to break down the city and temple; to pluck up Predictions of the destruction of Pharaoh-necho's army, near the Euphrates, by the Chaldeans, 1—12: and of the invasion and conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadrezzar, 13—26. A word of encouragement to Jacob, 27, 28.

2^a Against ^b Egypt, ^c against the army of Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, which was by the river Euphrates in Carmish, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon ^d smote in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah.

3 Order ye the buckler and shield, and draw near to battle.

4 Harness the horses; and get up, ye horsemen, and stand forth with your helmets; furbish the spears, and put on your brigandines.

Wherefore have I seen them dismayed, and turned away back? and their mighty ones are * beaten down, and are fled ^b apace, and look not back: for fear was round about, saith the Lord.

6 Let ^a not the swift flee away, nor the mighty man escape; they shall stumble, and fall ^m toward the north by the river Euphrates.

7 Who is this that cometh up ^o as a flood, whose waters are moved as the rivers?

8 Egypt ^p riseth up like a flood, and his waters are moved like the rivers; and he saith, I will go up, and will cover the earth; I will destroy the city, and the inhabitants thereof.

the people from the land in which he had planted them; and to make dreadful destruction upon the Jews and neighbouring nations; and was this a time for one of his servants to seek great things for himself? This was, (as one expresses it) like painting his own cabin whilst the ship was sinking. He was therefore commanded to give up such carnal pursuits; and he was assured, that the Lord would protect him from violence; so that neither Jehoiakim, nor the Chaldeans, nor the Jews, should put him to death; but that he should be wonderfully preserved in all places, till his time should come to die, according to the ordinary course of nature. (Note, xxi. 9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The eyes of the Lord are always upon us; he notices the troubles of the most inconsiderable of his servants; and he will reprove or encourage them as he sees needful. We are all averse to the cross; but young converts and inexperienced ministers are most apt to be cast down by danger and opposition. Our dejections are generally greater than there is cause for; they always arise from weakness of faith and want of submission to the will of God; and they commonly have in them a great mixture of attachment to external things. We are apt to indulge a hope of being considerable in one way or other, and to flatter ourselves with the prospect of reputation or affluence; we are pleased with our own dreams, and put out of temper by being awakened out of them. But the Lord knows the real cause of our despondency better than we do; and we should beg of him to examine our hearts, and to enable us to repress and mortify every ambitious, covetous, or carnal desire. In such a world of sin and sorrow as this is at all times; (and not only in seasons of public calamity) where death is continually ravaging, and will speedily cut us off; and which the Lord will soon break down and destroy; with all them whose treasures and hearts are in it; we should not seek more than food convenient for us. And, however our lives may be preserved, or exposed, or whithersoever we may be driven, our chief diligence should be employed in obtaining an assurance, that when this earthly house of our tabernacle shall be dissolved, we shall have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1. This verse is the title of this and the five following chapters; and refers to the general denunciation of God's judgments upon the countries round about Judea, contained in the twenty-fifth chapter. (Lowth.) These nations had either helped forward the calamities of the Jews, or had rejoiced at them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. After Pharaoh-necho had slain Josiah in battle, and had gained great advantages in the countries bordering on the Euphrates, as he returned home, he entered Jerusalem, carried Jehoiakim captive into Egypt, and left Jehoiakim upon the throne of Judah. Some time after he raised a very great army, and marched into the same regions, to extend his conquests. But previously this prophecy had been delivered, in which his entire defeat by Nebuchadrezzar was predicted; (Notes, 2 Kings, xxiii. 29, 30. xxiv. 6.) This took place about the same time that Jehoiakim, the vassal or ally of Pharaoh, was carried captive to Babylon; who, making submissions to Nebuchadrezzar, was restored to his kingdom.

V. 3, 4. This is a poetical and ironical call to the Egyptians to muster their forces, and implies that all their courage and efforts would be in vain. (5, 6.)

V. 6. The original is future, and may more properly be rendered, "The swift shall not flee away; neither shall the mighty man escape, &c." For it is a clear prediction of what would certainly take place; and not an expression of what the prophet wished or prayed for.

V. 7, 8. He derideth the boastings of the Egyptians.

‘ who thought by their riches and power to have overcome the world; alluding to the river Nilus, which at certain times overfloweth the country of Egypt.’ Chaldea and Babylon seem especially meant, which Pharaoh-necho vainly expected to subjugate.

V. 9. ‘ These names in Hebrew are Cush, and Phul, and Lud; (Marg. Ref.) who were the Egyptians’ allies, (Ez. xxx. 5.) which makes it probable that they are all Africans: Cush, though it often signifies Arabia, yet sometimes denotes Ethiopia. Phul is here rendered Lybia: but Phul and Lubim are spoken of as distinct people, (Nah. iii. 9.) Phul may probably signify Mauritania, and Lud, or Ludim, the people of Meroc. These were famous for the use of the bow,” (Is. lxxvi. 19.) (Louth.)

V. 10. Pharaoh expected a day of victory and triumph: but the Lord intended a day of vengeance on him and on his army, and to make them a sacrifice to his offended justice, especially for their sin, in oppressing or deceiving Israel. The day of the Lord often signifies the day of his vengeance: from thence it comes to signify the day of judgment, in the New Testament, of which all other days of vengeance are earnest and forerunners.” (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. (Note. viii. 22.) ‘ He showeth, that no salve or medicine can prevail, where God giveth the wound.’

V. 12. The disgrace of being vanquished is commonly as much dreaded by mighty and haughty monarchs and nations, as the actual loss or suffering. The pride of Pharaoh and the Egyptians would, however, soon be, in this respect, most deeply mortified. This prophecy seems to have been fulfilled very soon after it was published. (Note. 2)

V. 13. This verse introduces a prediction of a more complete conquest of Egypt, which took place about eighteen years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Probably it was delivered by Jeremiah, after he went down into Egypt. (Notes. xliii. 8—13. xlii. 29, 30. Ez. xxix. —xxxii.)

V. 14. Stand, &c. That is, ‘ Prepare to act upon the defensive, for Egypt will soon be invaded.’

V. 15. The Hebrew word, rendered valiant, is sometimes spoken of God, (Gen. xlix. 24;) sometimes it is a title given to angels; (Ps. lxxviii. 25;) and here, the Septuagint understand it of Apis, the idol of Egypt.” (Louth.) It does not, however, appear, that the original can at all bear the interpretation put on it by the Septuagint: for, besides rendering a plural noun by the singular Apis, they add, “ thy elect calf could not abide.” It is not improbable, that both the translation and the interpolation were intended as an attack on the Egyptian idolatry; an injudicious and criminal, even if a well intended, measure; which has too often been imitated by those who, to serve a good cause, are not very scrupulous about the means which they employ.

V. 16, 17. The allies of Egypt, finding themselves unable to maintain the conflict, and perceiving that Pharaoh, though he had boasted great things, was not punctual to his engagements in coming to their assistance; resolved to escape for their lives, and return home, if they were able.

V. 18. ‘ Mount Tabor is not more surely fixed among the rest of the mountains; nor Carmel more immovably seated upon the sea-coast, than this word of mine is firmly fixed in heaven, and shall undoubtedly be performed. The king of Babylon shall come against Egypt.” (Bp. Hall.)

the power of Satan, the great murderer from the beginning, over our fallen race, by means of the pride, ambition, avarice, and revenge of the human heart : and likewise that God considers men as condemned criminals, whom he employs as executors of each other, as he sees good.—Neither valour, strength, speed, nor numbers, can avail those whom the righteous God determines to make sacrifices to his justice ; but they must be dismayed, flee away, and not escape ; and all their vain-glorious boasts and sanguine expectations must end in disappointment and confusion. They that plot mischief against others, generally fall into it themselves : and the wounds that God inflicts on his enemies can be healed by no medicines.—How do power and prosperity pass from one to another in this changing world ! Those nations that were the terror of the mighty, and seemed ready to cover the earth, are speedily so weakened, that they cannot defend themselves ! But nothing so exposes kingdoms to hostile invaders as intestine discords ; whilst mighty men thus stumble one against another, they all fall together, and the state becomes incapable of defending itself against the devouring sword of its enemies. When such events take place, when allies prove treacherous, and renowned princes and captains but a noise ; when valiant men are swept away or put to flight, the hand of the Lord should be acknowledged. For how can they stand, whom he driveth away ? or be courageous, whom he surrounds with terrors ! When his day of visitation cometh, the magnificence, luxury, and affluence of mighty nations vanish as a dream : and those who were sensual, and strong as fatted bullocks, fall an easy prey to every invader, and can no more resist them, than the forest can the axe of him that felleth it. So that they who trust in themselves, or in an arm of flesh, must be confounded and punished. But there is an appointed period to all earthly calamities : and therefore our grand concern is, to flee from the wrath to come. Instead of making provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof, we should be daily preparing for death and judgment. Having sought reconciliation to our offended God through Jesus Christ, we should stand fast in the faith, and seek to be furnished with patience and hope against every event ; for we know not what captivity, poverty, or tribulation, may await us : and therefore habitual self-denial and mortification to the world are our wisdom, as well as our duty. But nothing should dismay the servants of the Lord : he will save them from every place, where they have been scattered, and bring them to enjoy his rest and peace : he will be with them, and only correct them in measure ; and will not punish any of them with that everlasting destruction from his presence, which awaits all impotent transgressors.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVII. V. 1. ' Jeremiah had foretold that the Philistines should be conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, (xxv. 20.) This probably came to pass during the time of the siege of Tyre, which lasted thirteen years, as Josephus shows out of Philostratus, and the Phœnician ' annals.' (4.) (Lonth.) The Philistines had repeatedly been subjected by the kings of Judah ; but they had again recovered strength. The prophecy was delivered before Pharaoh took Gaza. ' This might probably happen after ' Pharaoh's victories at Megiddo and Carchemish, when ' Judea became tributary to him.' (Lonth.) The Philistines seem to have been at that time in prosperity, and at peace with the Chaldeans. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.)
 V. 3. (Note, viii. 16. Marg. Ref.) The terrifying circumstances of this invasion would so dismay the Philistines, that they would not dare to look back, even to see what became of their own children.

V. 4. Every helper, &c. The destruction of the Philistines would tend to weaken the power of their confederates, the Tyrians and Zidonians ; and to prepare the way for their subjection by Nebuchadnezzar. But some understand the words to signify, that the ruin of Tyre and Zidon, the helpers of the Philistines, would leave them without resource in their abject condition.

Caphtor. (Marg. Ref.)
 V. 5. This represents the total desolation of Gaza, which, with those of Ashkelon, would cause insupportable grief to the inhabitants : this they would express, by tearing or shaving off their hair, and cutting their flesh. (Marg. Ref.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVIII. V. 1. The following prophecies against Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the neighbouring countries, seem to have been fulfilled, during the siege of Tyre, (Ez. xxv. 8, &c.) Josephus places these events five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Jeremiah, in his prophecy, borrows several expressions from Isaiah's prophecy against the same people; though that was probably fulfilled several years before. (Lowth.) The predictions of Isaiah, it is probable, were fulfilled by Shalmaneser, but those of Jeremiah by Nebuchadnezzar. (Notes, Is. xv. xvi.)

V. 2. Moab should be no more praised as an honourable kingdom: for the invaders, having possessed themselves of Heshbon, would determine on the utter ruin of the nation. Or the passage may mean, that there should be no more glorying in Moab, concerning Heshbon, as a strong fortress or a flourishing city; for their enemies had devised their complete destruction. (Old. Trans.) A confederacy of the Moabites and the neighbouring nations is represented, by the Psalmist, as using the same language concerning Israel, which the Chaldeans are here introduced as employing concerning Moab. (Ps. lxxxiii. 4—12.)

V. 5. The lamentations of the Moabites would be so loud and grievous, as to be heard even by their enemies, at a distance; and thus they would direct them in their pursuit of the fugitives.

V. 6. Escape for your lives, and be content to be left poor and desolate, (Note, xvii. 5, 6;) and hide yourselves in barren places, whither the enemy will not pursue you.

V. 7. The Moabites had confided in their fortifications or methods of defence, and in the riches laid up in their treasures; or in their superstitious observances, and the treasures dedicated to their idol Chemosh. (Marg. Ref.)—

V. 6. Some understand this verse as the words of the Philistines, but it is not likely that they should consider the Chaldeans as “the sword of JEHOVAH.” It is rather a most animated and pathetic lamentation of the prophet over the miseries, which the just vengeance of God was inflicting on the nations for their sins. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. The prophet here returns an answer to the foregoing verse, importing that the havoc made by the sword among the Philistines was the effect of God's irreversible purpose and decree. (Lowth.) The original continues the animated apostrophe of the question, “How canst thou be quiet? &c.” “The sea-shore,” (included in this commission,) would take in Tyre and Sidon, which generally shared its fortunes: and this confirms the opinion, that the prophecy was fulfilled during the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Men often apprehend no danger from that quarter, whence evil is appointed against them. The height of ungodly prosperity is the fore-runner of destruction; and sinful pleasures terminate in out-cries and howlings of misery. We should commit our children to the Lord's keeping; for we know not how soon we may be deprived of power or heart to take any care of them ourselves.—When he intends to destroy the wicked, he will cut off every helper; and where he spoils, he will remove all consolation. The miseries occasioned by war should be regretted by us; and we should desire, that this sword of the Lord might be put into the scabbard and be still: yet we should be ready to acquiesce in his appointments, who, in perfect wisdom and justice, gives it commission, and will cause it to effect his appointments, notwithstanding all the power of those who attempt to stop its progress.

V. 11. The nation of Moab, though small, was very ancient, and had for many ages continued independent and prosperous. It had experienced few of those violent convulsions and revolutions with which the surrounding nations had been harassed: and though the Moabites seem to have suffered grievous calamities some years before; yet they had not been carried out of their land by repeated captivities, as Israel and Judah had been; and they had recovered their strength and prosperity before this time.

They were therefore like wine left long to refine and feed on the lees; which becomes much stronger than when frequently emptied from vessel to vessel. Having met with little disturbance, they were become proud, presumptuous, secure, and sensual; indulging in wickedness habitually, and from age to age, without any degree of reformation.

V. 12. The Chaldeans would march far from home under the secret direction of God to conquer the Moabites, and to carry them away captive into a distant country; desolating their cities, wasting their country, and destroying all that they had gloried in.

these severe judgments on Moab, a heathen nation, is this, that "he had magnified himself against JEHOVAH." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 43, 44. (Note, Isaiah, xxiv. 17, 18.)

V. 45, 46. Heshbon, a strong fenced city, would by no means prove a refuge to those who took shelter there: for falling into the hands of the conquerors, a fire would, as it were, issue from it, to destroy the rest of the country. The prophet on this occasion adopts the language in which the Amorites, many ages before, had triumphantly exulted over Moab. (Note, Num. xxi. 26, 30.)

V. 47. "The Moabites were afterwards restored to their country, as appears from Josephus: but these and such like promises of mercy, after judgment, are chiefly to be understood of the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, under the Gospel, called the latter days by the prophets." (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-25.

Wo be to all those against whom the Lord of Hosts hath spoken! they can expect nothing but terror and confusion; all their praise and honour must expire in infamy; they who devise evil against them will succeed according to their wishes; the sword of justice will pursue them; weeping and bitter wailing will attend their great destruction; and generally their children are involved in calamities on their account. There is indeed a Refuge provided for sinners: and the exhortation should be very pressing "to flee from the wrath to come," to seek the salvation of their souls, and to forsake all for Christ and the Gospel; as men in perilous circumstances part with all their substance to save their lives. But the case of obstinate unbelievers is very dreadful; for how shall they escape, who neglect "so great salvation?" They who trust in their own works, treasures, or superstitions, will soon be overtaken by the vengeance of God, and will go into destruction, along with their idols and deceivers, and will for ever be made ashamed of their confidences. No guilty city, village, or individual, shall be able to escape the ruin that the Lord hath spoken against them: and if any could give wings to sinners, they could not fly out of the reach of divine indignation. Whatever the Lord enjoins us must be done heartily, and according to his word, if we would escape his curse. We should indeed be thankful, that we are required to seek the preservation of men's lives, and the salvation of their souls, and not to shed their blood; but we shall be the more inexcusable, if we do this work deceitfully, preferring our own interest, credit, inclination, or indulgence, to the glory and will of God: and it is great injustice, for man to pretend to be more merciful than his Creator. When men continue long in peace, wealth, and prosperity, and escape the calamities which others experience, they are apt to grow insensible and secure; to contract habits of pride, impiety, iniquity, and self-indulgence; to cleave without remorse to evil practices, and to proceed from bad to worse: so that great prosperity is peculiarly dangerous to us fallen creatures. But when the Lord's time comes, he will send upon sinners, who are thus settled on their lees, such judgments as will dash their comforts and hopes in pieces. In vain do men say, that they are mighty and strong for the battle: when the King, the Lord of hosts, hath a controversy with a people, their young men go down to the slaughter, rather than to battle; and all the beauty and strength of nations only tend to increase the astonishment of those who behold their ruin, and exclaim, "How is the strong staff broken, and the beautiful rod?" Every circumstance, that tended to increase their glory, now enhances their misery; and every inquiry about what is done makes known their terror and distress. But "the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works:" He does not cut off the horn and break the arm of any, except such as have magnified themselves against him.

V. 26-47.

When sinners grow intoxicated with pride and ungodly lusts, the Lord will make them drunken with his judgments, and expose them to shame and derision. He abhors those who rejoice in the calamities of their neighbours, and insult over the miserable, and especially over his inoffensive worshippers. Yet this is a general effect of the envy, malice, selfishness, and impiety, of the human heart. But pride, in its multiplied exercises, is the fruitful root of unnumbered crimes, and when this diabolical vice grows stronger continually, disgrace and ruin are at hand; for "a haughty spirit goes before a fall;" and the Lord knows the malice, deceit, and lies, of his enemies, and will disappoint them. It becomes us to compassionate the sufferings even of our enemies, when joy and gladness are taken away from the plentiful field; when penury and famine succeed luxury and abundance, and the riches of those who once lived in splendour are perished; we should sympathize in their sorrows, and be ready to afford them such relief as we are able. But we should also take warning to avoid their transgressions; and, amidst the changes and calamities that surround us, we should learn to “set our affections on things above, and not on things on the earth.” If our sins be pardoned, and our hearts renewed, the Lord will preserve us from every fear, pit, and snare, into which others fall; and whilst the vessels of wrath, in which he had no pleasure, and which are fitted for destruction, shall perish for ever, he will effectually take care of those vessels of mercy, whom he hath afore prepared for his glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIX. V. 1. The old translation more exactly renders the first clause, “Unto the children of Ammon, thus saith the LORD.” The same may be noted concerning the other nations mentioned in this chapter. The king of Ammon had sent Ishmael to murder Gedaliah, and probably Nebuchadnezzar intended to revenge that injury, when he made war against the Ammonites: but the Lord had a controversy with them, on account of their injustice to his people Israel. Being situated on the north-east border of the land, the Ammonites seized every opportunity of getting possession of their cities and lands, as if the Israelites had no heirs; and thus the subjects of the king of Ammon, or the worshippers of Melcom the idol of Ammon, (so it may be understood,) dwelt in the lot of Gad, and in the cities which God had given to his people, and which had not belonged to their ancestors. It seems that their rapacity was attended with the most shocking barbarity. (Note, Amos i. 13—15.) Even before the Syrians and Assyrians had dispossessed the Israelites, several cities, originally given to Gad or Reuben, were possessed by the Ammonites. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. Daughters. ‘The lesser cities, which are reckoned as so many daughters to the mother-city.’ ‘The Jews made themselves masters of the Ammonites and the neighbouring countries under the Maccabees,’ (1 Mac. v. 6, 7.) ‘The words heir and inheritance, in the Hebrew, signify any real and lasting possession.’ (Louth.)

V. 3. When Ai, a city of the Ammonites, is destroyed,—it is time for Heshbon, the chief city of Moab, to lament her danger; for her turn comes next.’ (xlviii. 2.) (Louth.) ‘Howl, O Heshbon, the chief city of the Gadites, (usurped by Ammon;) for Ai, the neighbouring city, is spoiled.’ (Bp. Hall.) Heshbon, the capital of Sihon’s kingdom, had originally been taken from Moab. (Num. xxi. 26—30;) and it is generally supposed that Heshbon of Moab, (xlviii. 2.) is the same city, the Moabites having again got possession of it. But it is not certain that another city, called after the name of that which the Amorites took from Moab, might not be intended. The kingdom of Sihon was divided between Reuben and Gad: Heshbon was at first allotted to Reuben; but it is afterwards mentioned as a city of Gad. (Num. xxxii. 34—38. Josh. xiii. 15—18. xxi. 39.) So that either Moab, or Ammon, had taken it from Reuben or Gad. Heshbon is mentioned by Isaiah as a city of Moab; as are several others, which had been given to Reuben and Gad. (Compare Num. xxxii. 34—38, and Josh. xiii. 15—28, with Is. xv. xvi. ;) but Heshbon, as a city of Ammon, is not elsewhere mentioned.

Run to, &c. ‘Try to hide yourselves in the thickets, and remove from one place to another for fear of being discovered.’ (Louth.) —Their king, &c. Or Melcom. (Marg. Reading. xlviii. 7.)

V. 4. The Ammonites gloried, either in the security of their valleys, as surrounded on every side with mountains, so that no army could penetrate into their country; or in the fruitfulness of them: one in particular was called “the flowing valley,” as resembling Canaan, that flowed with milk and honey. Ammon is called a backsliding daughter, either as having apostatized from the religion of Lot, the ancestor of the nation, or as refractory and rebellious, which the word may signify.

V. 6. (Note, xlvi. 47.) It is observable, that the Septuagint leave out these intimations of mercy in reserve for the descendants of Moab and Ammon; though that concerning Elam is not omitted. (39.)— The conversion of idolaters is expressed by returning from their captivity. (Ez. xvi. 53.) (Louth.)

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.)—Eliphaz, the friend of Job, was a Temanite; and it is probable, that the descendants of Esau were among those children of the east, who in Solomon's days were famed for wisdom, (1 Kings, iv. 30;) but, when God designs a people for destruction, he deprives them of that common prudence and foresight, which is requisite for the management of their affairs; and takes from them their usual courage, so that "a thousand flee at the rebuke of one." (Obad. 3, 9.) (Louth.)

V. 8. Ezekiel mentions Dedan twice, in his account of those who traded with Tyre: in one place he speaks of the Dedanites, the descendants of Dedan, the son of Abraham by Keturah; in the other, as it is probable, of those who inhabited Dedan, a city in Idumæa. (Gen. xxv. 3. Ez. xxvii. 15, 20.)

Dwell, &c. That is, Retire into your caverns and fastnesses, to secure yourselves, for there will be no security in the open country, or even in the cities.

V. 9—11. (Ob. 5, 6.) Grape-gatherers generally leave some gleanings; and nocturnal depredators take what they can, yet do not destroy every thing: but the Chaldeans, whom God employed to desolate Edom, would entirely spoil them; they would discover and plunder their secret treasures, and leave them no refuge to hide in; and they would so destroy their seed, and brethren, and neighbours, that there would be none left to say to those that were dying, Leave thy orphans and widows to my care, and I will provide for them.' This seems the most natural meaning of the passage in this connexion; though the latter part of it is generally quoted as a promise to the people of God, when about to leave the world: and some suppose, that it was intended for the afflicted Israelites, to remind them of the advantages which they possessed above the Edomites. Some indeed understand it ironically, as if no orphans or widows would remain, about whom the dying Edomites need be concerned: but so entire a massacre does not often take place; and such a way of predicting so dire an event does not accord with the general manner of the holy Scriptures.

V. 12. The people of God might have expected an exemption from the calamities which overtook his enemies; yet they had been deeply involved in them: and could the Edomites hope to escape?—Not the character, but the peculiar privileges of the Israelites, were alluded to. (1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.)

V. 13. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6.)

V. 14. God's stirring up men's spirits is described here, as if he had sent ambassadors to the Chaldeans and their confederates, to engage them in the war against the Idumæans. (Louth.)

V. 16. The word rendered terribleness is, by some, supposed to mean an idol worshipped by the Idumæans, from which they expected help, but which would disappoint their confidence.—Jerom, who lived in the neighbourhood, tells us, in his commentary on Obadiah, that Idumæa was a rocky mountainous country; and that the inhabitants dwelt in caves dug out of the rocks and hills. 17 Also ^a Edom shall be a desolation: every one that goeth by it shall be astonished, and ^x shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.

18 As ^y in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the neighbour-cities thereof, saith the Lord, ^z no man shall abide there, neither shall a son of man dwell in it.

19 Behold, ^a he shall come up like a lion from ^b the swelling of Jordan against the habitation of the strong: but I will suddenly make him run away from her; and who ^{is} a chosen man, that I may appoint over her? for ^c who is like me! and who will ^x appoint me the time? and who ^{is} ^d that shepherd that will stand before me?

20 Therefore hear ^e the counsel of the Lord, that he hath taken against Edom; and his purposes, that he hath purposed against the inhabitants of ^f Teman: ^g Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out, surely he shall ^h make their habitations desolate with them.

21 The ⁱ earth is moved at the noise of their fall; at the cry, the noise thereof was heard in the [†] Red Sea.

22 Behold, ^k he shall come up, and fly as the eagle, and spread his wings over ^l Bozrah: and at that day shall be the heart of the mighty men of Edom as the heart of a woman in her pangs.

23 † Concerning ^a Damascus. ^o Hamath is confounded, and Arpad: for they have heard evil tidings: they are [†] faint-hearted; there is ^p sorrow [†] on the sea; it cannot be quiet.

24 Damascus is ^q waxed feeble, and turneth herself to flee, and fear hath seized on ^{her}: anguish and sorrows have taken her, as a woman in travail.

25 ^r How is the city of praise not left, the city of my joy!

26 Therefore ^s her young men shall fall in her streets, and all the men of war shall be cut off in that day, saith the Lord of hosts.

27 And ^t I will kindle a fire in the wall of Damascus, and it shall consume the palaces of ^u Ben-hadad.

28 † Concerning ^v Kedar, and concerning the kingdoms ^y of Habor, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon shall smite, thus saith the Lord; ^z Aise ye, go up to Kedar, and ^a spoil the men of the east.

29 Their ^b tents and their flocks shall they take away: they shall take to themselves their ^c curtains, and all their vessels, and their ^d camels; and they shall cry unto them, ^e Fear is on every side.

V. 17, 18. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. Nebuchadnezzar was about to come up, (as a lion from the banks of Jordan, when driven from his den by the overflowing waters, he fiercely assaulted the sheep-folds;) and the Lord would cause him suddenly to run upon the land of Edom, though it was strongly fortified: or he would cause the Edomites suddenly to run out of the land, as despairing of success against so powerful an invader. For the Lord had, as it were, summoned all the valiant captains of the earth to appear before him, that he might appoint one to this service; and from them all he had chosen Nebuchadnezzar. And who, like the Lord, was able to prepare instruments to his work? Who dared to appoint him a time, either to meet him in judgment, or to face him in battle? Or what ruler of Edom would dare to withstand Him, and the weapons of his indignation? What shepherd could meet this fierce lion, to defend the sheep fold against him? Let then the Edomites hear the counsel and purpose of God against them, for he meant so to enfeeble and intimidate them, that the least of Nebuchadnezzar's soldiers would be able to draw them out of their cities, and to lead them into captivity. (l. 44, 45. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. All the adjacent regions would hear with astonishment of Edom's ruin; and the outcries of the sufferers would be heard at the Red Sea, which lay at a considerable distance.

V. 22. (Note, xlvi. 40. Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Marg. Ref.) Damascus, the chief city of Syria, is put for the whole country, which it is probable Nebuchadnezzar totally subdued during the siege of Tyre.

On the, &c. Or, "as on the sea," when the ship is sinking, and the sailors have nothing but death before their eyes.

V. 25. This may be considered as the language of the king or the inhabitants of Damascus, when they found their city, which they had so much applauded and rejoiced in, involved in the common fate of other cities that had been desolated by the Chaldeans.

V. 27. Ben-hadad. A common name of the kings of Syria; (Marg. Ref.) The accomplishment of these prophecies on the surrounding nations, during the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, would greatly tend to encourage their hopes of that deliverance, which had been predicted by the same prophet: and to impress the spectators with a conviction, that the God of Israel was indeed the Lord of heaven and earth.

V. 28. Kedar and Habor seem to have been districts to the south-east of the land of Canaan, occupied by different tribes of the Arabians, who lived in tents, and subsisted chiefly by feeding cattle, or by rapine. (Marg. Ref.)

36 And upon Elam will I bring † the four winds from the four quarters of heaven, and will † scatter them toward all those winds; and there shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come.

V. 34. Elam was a district of the country afterwards called Persia. It was subjected and ravaged by Nebuchadrezzar; but under Cyrus it aided to destroy the Chaldean monarchy. (Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—22.

The Lord notes down, and will call men to an account for, every instance of dishonesty; and especially for all their injustice to the destitute and orphans, who are not able to defend their own property. Power may for a time overcome right; but he will cause the injurious to make ample restitution for all their ill-gotten wealth, or he will distraint upon them for it. The commission of iniquity, nay, the connivance at it, by those in authority, causes the alarm of war with all its desolations to be heard in the land: and it is a serious inquiry, whether an account of this kind do not stand out against this nation, in respect of several of our foreign dependencies? and whether they may not be male heirs to our wealth in those parts, who have been unjustly deprived of their inheritances?—It is in vain for those who rebel against God, to glory in fruitful fields and flowing valleys, or to trust in fleets, armies, treasures, or advantageous situations. His terror can make even the stoutest to flee; and at his word, kings, princes, and priests, must go into captivity together. But, however the people of God may be plundered and injured, they will inherit the earth, and “the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just.” Wisdom and counsel cannot be preserved from vanishing and perishing, when the time of God’s visitation comes. By a blow or a fever the finest genius may be rendered an idiot, and the gravest statesman a lunatic. Even when the faculties are preserved, their counsels may be so infatuated, that they may appear as fools and madmen to all around them: and in short, without true piety there can be no valuable or durable wisdom. When the Lord lets loose victorious armies to spoil guilty nations, not only for the sake of plunder, but out of wanton cruelty; when the inhabitants are driven into, or hunted out of their fastnesses, and cut off by the devouring sword; the case of widows and fatherless children appears very deplorable. But the Lord hath given gracious intimations of his special care of them; and if the dying believer have neither friend nor brother to take charge of those whom he leaves behind; if he can make no provision for them, nor direct them to any earthly protection; he may be satisfied in hearing the Lord say to him, “Leave thy fatherless children, and I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me.” This is a strong tower, into which the righteous may flee and be safe in every emergency; but no secret places can hide the sinner from the Lord. And if the children of God here drink the bitter cup of affliction, can prosperous rebels expect to escape altogether unpunished? Indeed, the Lord hath sworn by himself, that they shall drink the cup of his vengeance to the very dregs, and wring them out; and that they shall become a reproach, and a curse, and a desolation. The Lord will make those small among the nations, and despised among men, who exalt themselves against him and his people. When nations grow formidable to their neighbours, and eminent in power and prosperity, their pride often deceives them; they deem themselves like the eagle, that hath made her nest in the top of the rock, and forget that the Lord can easily bring them down from thence. He is as powerful and as holy, as when he overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah: he can as easily destroy this guilty land, as he did those devoted cities, and make it an astonishment and an hissing to all that go by. It is therefore far safer to trust his promises, in the way of repentance and obedience, than to rely on our advantages and to commit iniquity. He can choose from the whole earth the most proper person for his work; or he can form one on purpose, as he pleases. Who then is like unto the LORD? Who can stand in judgment before him? "Who hath hardened his heart against him, and prospered?" He needs not the powerful of the earth to execute his vengeance: when his purposes are to be fulfilled, the feeblest instrument can prevail against the most potent of his enemies; and the earth shall be moved at the sound of their fall, whilst their hearts melt, as the heart of a woman in her pangs.

V. 23—39.

Divine judgments continually go round from nation to nation: dismal tidings are heard: the earth is full of commotion, and cannot be quiet: admired and joyous cities are desolated, and their splendid palaces are consumed; and those that dwell in tents, and who have neither gates nor bars, cannot escape the rapacity of the executioners of divine vengeance. In all these events, the righteousness of God should be observed, amidst the violence and injustice of men. He sits on his throne judging right: by his judgments he shows his own holiness, and the evil of sin, and gives an earnest of the day of future righteous retribution. He thus calls sinners to repentance; he confirms the faith and hope of his people, and warneth them not to abuse his mercy: and they learn not to fear any purposes of man against them, when they can rejoice in the assurance, that "the LORD of hosts is with them, the God of

"Jacob is their Refuge;" and to expect, that by all these convulsions and revolutions, way will be made for the more complete establishment of the Redeemer's kingdom. In the latter days, when peace, holiness, and truth, shall fill the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. L. V. 1. The Chaldeans had been employed as the scourge of God against all the surrounding nations; but it was his purpose that they should be made a still more tremendous example of the power of his wrath and the truth of his word. Their crimes were more enormous than those of other nations; and they were the most grievous oppressors that Israel ever had. This follows the rest of the prophecies against the neighbouring countries, according to the method of God's judgments laid down before, (xxv.) where the prophet declares, that after Nebuchadnezzar and his successors had fulfilled God's purposes, in being the executioners of his vengeance upon other countries, they themselves should drink of the same cup. The prophecy has a further aspect on that mystical Babylon, mentioned in Revelations, and many of the expressions in it are applied by St. John to the downfall of Antichrist. (Louth.) (Notes, &c. Isaiah xliii. xiv. xxi. xxvi. xlvii. Rev. xiv—xix.)

By, &c. "By the ministry of Jeremiah." (Old Trans.) V. 2, 3. (Note, Is. xli. 1, 2. Marg. Ref) The ruin of Babylon was here predicted, as if it had already taken place. Notice was particularly taken of the destruction of the idols of Babylon; for that city was noted for her idols, and the immense treasures dedicated to them; and the Persians destroyed all images wherever they came, and plundered all the treasures contained in their temples: for they worshipped the sun under the emblem of fire; or, as some think, an invisible supreme God, under the external symbols of fire and of the sun. Chaldea lay to the north of Judea; but the Medes and Persians came from the north of Chaldea. The Pagan Roman empire was subverted by the northern nations; and probably the ruin of the antichristian powers will come upon them from the same quarter. The destruction of Babylon, which was begun by the Medes and Persians, became at length so entire, that it hath for ages been uninhabited by man, and deserted by every useful animal. This prophecy was delivered when Babylon was growing greater and more prosperous continually.

 Lord in a perpetual covenant, that shall not be forgotten.

6 My people hath been lost sheep:
 their shepherds have caused them to go astray; they have turned them away on the mountains; they have gone from mountain to hill; they have forgotten their resting place.

7 All that found them have devoured them: and their adversaries said, We offend not; because they have sinned against the Lord, the Habitation of justice, even the Lord, the Hope of their fathers.

8 Remove out of the midst of Babylon, and go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans, and be as the he-goats before the flocks.

9 For, lo, I will raise, and cause to come up against Babylon, an assembly of great nations from the north country:

 and they shall set themselves in array against her: from thence she shall be taken; their arrows shall be of a mighty expert man; none shall return in vain.

10 And Chaldea shall be a spoil:
 all that spoil her shall be satisfied, saith the Lord.

11 Because ye were glad, because ye rejoiced, O ye destroyers of mine heritage; because ye are grown fat as the heifer at grass, and as the bellow as bulls;

12 Your mother shall be sore confounded; she that bare you shall be ashamed; behold, the hindermost of the nations shall be a wilderness, a dry land, and a desert.

13 Because of the wrath of the Lord it shall not be inhabited, but it shall be wholly desolate: every one that goeth by Babylon shall be astonished, and hiss at all her plagues.

V. 4—6. The restoration of the Jews and many Israelites to their own land, was connected with the subversion of the Babylonish monarchy; and the more extensive spread of Christianity, attended with the conversion of the Jews, will be connected with the ruin of the new Testament Babylon: but some think that the future conversion of the Jews, and the restoration to their own land, is also predicted. The people are represented as convinced of their guilt, their duty, and their true interest: so that, weeping for their former sins, and for joy on account of their happy deliverance, they go to seek the Lord their God: they determine to leave Babylon and return to Zion, according to the liberty given them by Cyrus. Being unacquainted with the road, they inquire about it, as travellers, who have turned their faces thitherward, being already set out and determined to proceed: and they invite their brethren to go with them, and encourage each other to go forward; that on Mount Zion they may join themselves to the Lord, and renew their acceptance and confirmation of his covenant, which was perpetually in force and obligatory; that (as persuaded he would not fail to perform it with them,) they might engage themselves not to forget to walk with him according to it. The covenant entered into by Josiah and the people, which was speedily forgotten and violated, may be referred to. Then the Lord mercifully considers the former sufferings of his people. Their rulers and teachers, who should have fed and tended them as the flock of God, had occasioned their dispersal, by seducing them to idolatry. They had turned them aside from the right worship of God at Jerusalem, to sacrifice to idols on mountains and high places.
 (Louth.) Thus they were exposed, as lost sheep, to be devoured by their enemies, who were like wolves and lions; and they had not thought of returning to their resting-place, to God, and his worship. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. The Chaldeans, having heard that the Lord was punishing the Jews for their sins against him, supposed that they did not offend by destroying them. They allowed, that he had in former times been the Habitation of justice, the sure Protector of the righteous, and the Hope of the fathers of the Jews: but they thought that he would not defend such wicked persons, or punish those who spoiled and murdered them; as if they had been free from sin, or as if they had sought the glory of God, or acted in obedience to his commandment and in support of his righteousness, when they fought against Israel! But as the Lord had now taken vengeance on these oppressors of his people, the Jews were ordered to leave Babylon; and the leading men to go before others, as the he-goats before the flock, without fearing any obstruction or opposition.
 Let every one strive to lead the way to others, and give them an example of speedily obeying God's call, without showing any fondness for the place, or the idolatries there practised. (Louth.)

V. 10. Satisfied. They shall be enriched by the plunder, and have as much as they can desire. The treasures accumulated at Babylon were immensely great.

V. 11. The Chaldeans were the executors of God's judgments on the Jews; but they were carried on purely by their own ambition and covetousness, though Providence directed their cruelties and oppressions to the fulfilling its own ends and purposes. (Louth.) They in-sulted over the miseries of the Jews, and in their success against the worshippers of JEHOVAH; and they were become exceedingly prosperous and insolent.

V. 12, 13. Babylon was the mother-city, or metropolis, of 14 Put yourselves in array against Babylon round about: all ye that bend the bow, shoot at her, spare no arrows: for she hath sinned against the Lord.

15 Shout against her round about: she hath given her hand: her foundations are fallen, her walls are thrown down: for it is the vengeance of the Lord: take vengeance upon her; as she hath done, do unto her.

16 Cut off the sower from Babylon, and him that handleth the sickle in the time of harvest: for fear of the oppressing sword they shall turn every one to his people, and they shall flee every one to his own land.

17 Israel is a scattered sheep, the lions have driven him away: first the king of Assyria hath devoured him; and last this Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones.

18 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will punish the king of Babylon and his land, as I have punished the king of Assyria.

19 And I will bring Israel again to his habitation, and he shall feed on Carmel and Bashan, and his soul shall be satisfied upon mount Ephraim and Gilead.

20 In those days, and in that time, saith the LORD, the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found: for I will pardon them whom I reserve.

21 Go up against the land of Merathaim, even against it, and against the inhabitants of Pekod: waste and utterly destroy after them, saith the LORD, and do according to all that I have commanded thee.

the Chaldean empire. This was the greatest monarchy on earth at that time: yet the prophet called the Chaldeans the hindermost of the nations, either because of their wickedness, or in the prospect of the abject state to which they would be reduced; or as drinking last of the cup of vengeance, which he had been directed to send to the nations, (xxv. 26.) The words may mean "She shall be the hindermost of the nations, a wilderness," &c. Isaiah predicted, that "Babylon should be pools of water," (Is. xiv. 23:) here it is foretold, that she should be "a dry land" and a desert." At first, the overflowing of the Euphrates reduced the adjacent country to a fen or marsh: but there is some ground to think, that in process of ages, and by the changes thus gradually produced, Jeremiah's prediction also was literally fulfilled; as well as in the entire desolations of the city. (Note, li. 61-64.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. Sinned. 'She hath been,' in a remarkable manner, an enemy to God's truth and people. This may be especially applied to the mystical Babylon. (Louth.) 'Though the Lord called the Babylonians his servants, and their work his work; yet, because they did it not to glorify God, but for their own malice, and to profit themselves, it is here called sin.'

V. 15. Given. &c. Either as entering into a confederacy with other nations to defend herself against the predicted vengeance; or rather as surrendering to the conqueror, as captives give their hands to be bound. Though Cyrus did not destroy the walls of Babylon, yet he began to execute that vengeance of God, which continued to be inflicted, till her walls and foundations were totally destroyed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. 'Babylon was more like a country walled in, than a city; her walls being sixty miles in circumference, according to Herodotus; forty eight according to Strabo. Within this circuit, a great deal of ground was taken up in corn-fields; so that they had corn enough growing within the walls to maintain a siege, as Q. Curtius asserts.' (Louth.) The slaughter of the husbandmen, therefore, and the consequent neglect of agriculture, would increase the miseries of the inhabitants, and hasten the ruin of the city. The reader must recollect, that not only the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, but all the subsequent sieges and calamities of that city, terminating in her utter desolation, are here predicted.

For fear. This is spoken of the allies and hired soldiers of Babylon. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. (Marg. Ref.)
V. 18. Either the destruction of Sennacherib's army, and his death by the hand of his sons; or the destruction of Nineveh, as foretold by Jonah, Nabum, and Zephaniah, is here referred to. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. The Jews never relapsed, after the captivity, into those idolatries, which had been their great national offence, and had exposed them to their sufferings. This and their other national guilt were repented of; pardoned, and blotted out; so that they could no more be found. But the words can be applied in their full meaning to none but true believers, the spiritual Israel, whose sins are all buried in the depth of the sea, so that none can lay any thing to their charge, or find any unpardoned or unmortified sin in them. The passage implies a prediction of the future conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their full participation of all the blessings of his Gospel. In all the judgments God brings upon his people, he promises to reserve a remnant. St. Paul calls it "a remnant according to the election of grace." (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. (Margin.) Merathaim, signifies rebels, and Pekod, visitation. But Pekod is spoken of as the name of a country or city belonging to Babylon, (Ez. xxiii. 23.)

and it is probable Merathaim was the same.* The names, however, seem to have been selected, because of their signification. The time of visitation on the rebels is com-

According, &c. Those persons, whom God raises up to fulfil his decrees,—are said to perform his commands.
(Louth. Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. Hammer. That oppressive empire which “smote the nations with a continual stroke.” (Louth.) Babylon had been used as a hammer to break in pieces the nations, in all that part of the earth; and was found too hard and heavy to be resisted by them: but this hammer would soon be broken in pieces by the Medes and Persians, to the astonishment of all the surrounding countries.

V. 24. Cyrus took Babylon by surprise, when neither the king nor the inhabitants had the least expectation of such an event. His stratagem was successful, because God was pleased in this manner to show how vain and how fatal it is to strive against Him.

V. 25. ‘God hath raised up enemies to subdue the Chaldeans,—and hath furnished them with all necessary provision for such an undertaking.’ (Louth.)

V. 26. Heaps. The marginal reading is to be preferred, “Tread her as heaps;”—as corn is trodden down when it is threshed. (Louth.)

V. 27. Bullocks, &c. The princes of Babylon had been living in prosperity and growing fat as bullocks, (11:) and they would very soon be led forth to the slaughter, continuing insensible of their danger to the last. Cyrus took Babylon, when they were all engaged in feasting and riot. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. The Jews, when liberated by Cyrus, returned to Jerusalem, and there celebrated the praises of God in fulfilling his word against Babylon: and from time to time, as further desolations were there made, many Jews, fleeing from that city and its neighbourhood, would carry the report to their brethren in Judea. (Note. li. 64.)

The vengeance, &c. The Chaldeans were guilty of the greatest impiety, in destroying the temple of God, as well as of cruelty and oppression upon the Jews, (7.) Belshazzar was profaning the vessels of the temple in the most blasphemous manner, when the hand-writing announced his destruction, (Dan. v.) and the ruin of the Chaldeans was the vengeance of God’s temple, and the punishment of their enmity against him and his people.

V. 29. Do, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30. Gadatas and Gobrias, two of Cyrus’s captains, when they had entered Babylon, marched, with the troops under their command, directly to the palace; and killing all they met, became masters of it, and slew Belshazzar also. (Venophon.)

V. 31. The old translation renders this, “I am unto “thee, O proud man, &c.” And this seems the real meaning of the passage. Belshazzar, the king of Babylon, is especially meant. Nebuchadnezzar had humbled himself before God, but Belshazzar had continued to magnify himself against him, till the hand-writing on the wall declared that his day was come, &c. (Notes, Dan. iv. v.)

V. 32. I will kindle, &c. This may be meant of the destructions made in the Babylonian territories, in the several expeditions Cyrus undertook against that monarchy, during the space of twenty years before the taking of Babylon. (Louth.)

V. 33. The governors of nearly the same territories oppressed both Israel and Judah. For the kings of Babylon, having succeeded to those of Assyria, imitated them in cruelly oppressing the worshippers of JEHovah.

V. 31. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2 Thes. i. Rev. xviii.)

V. 35. Princes, &c. Most of these were slain with Belshazzar, when Babylon was taken. 'The Chaldeans were famous for their skill in astrology, and other arts of divination, and yet the learned in those sciences were not able to foresee or prevent the dangers coming on themselves.' (Lowth)

V. 36. Liars. "He frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh the diviners mad." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 37. Treasures. They shall be a prey to such as come sword in hand to rifle them. As Solon said to Cresus, who by way of ostentation showed him his treasures, Sir, if any one come that has better iron than you, he will be master of all your gold.' (Lowth.)

V. 38. Dried up. &c. Babylon was taken by means there, neither shall any son of man dwell therein.

41 Behold, ^s a people shall come from the north, and a great nation, and many kings shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth.

42 They shall ^t hold the bow and the lance: ^u they are cruel, and will not shew mercy: ^v their voice shall roar like the sea, and they ^y shall ride upon horses, every one put in array, like a man to the battle, against thee, O daughter of Babylon.

43 The ^z king of Babylon hath heard the report of them, and his hands waxed feeble: anguish took hold of him, and ^a pangs as of a woman in travail.

44 Behold, he shall come up ^b like a lion from the swelling of Jordan unto the habitation of the strong: but I will make them suddenly run away from her; and ^c who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her? for who is like me? and who will ^d appoint me the time? and ^e who is that shepherd that will stand before me!

45 Therefore ^f hear ye the counsel of the LORD, that he hath taken against Babylon: and his purposes, that he hath purposed against the land of the Chaldeans: Surely ^g the least of the flock shall draw them out: surely he shall make their habitation desolate with them.

46 At ^h the noise of the taking of Babylon the earth is moved, and the cry is heard among the nations.

of the draining of the channel of the Euphrates, through which Cyrus marched his army into the heart of the city; at the very time when Belshazzar and his princes, his wives and his concubines, were madly insulting the God of heaven, and celebrating the praises of their idols.

V. 39, 40. (Marg. Ref. Note, li. 64.)

V. 42. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, from this account of the cruelty manifested by the Medes and Persians, that Xenophon's encomiums on Cyrus, for clemency as well as other virtues, were rather a declaration of what he thought a great prince should be, than a just estimate of Cyrus's character.

V. 43. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Dan. v.)

V. 44, 45. (Note, xlix. 19, 20.) The same expressions, that were before used concerning the king of Babylon, as the executioner of the vengeance of God on Edom, are here used of Cyrus, as employed in the same service against Babylon.

Further predictions of terrible judgments on Babylon, for her enormous wickedness, 1—58. Seraiah is ordered to

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The longer God delays his judgments, the heavier they will fall on those who go on to treasure up wrath against the day of righteous retribution. His servants must not hesitate to declare his threatenings to the most prosperous sinners; either from fear of their frown, hope of their favour, or even gratitude for their kindness. The ruin of those who have been the supports of idolatry, infidelity, superstition, or impiety, is necessary, in order to the revival of true godliness, and the more general propagation of Christianity; and the prophecies of Scripture may yield great comfort to the believer, in this view of them. It should not be concealed, but published to all the nations, that the great seat of anti-christian tyranny, idolatry, and superstition, and the grand persecutor of true Christians, is as certainly doomed to destruction as ancient Babylon was; and that all her idols will be broken, and her abominations buried in her ruins: for the Lord will cause his standard to be set up, and the instruments of his anger will be gathered together, to render her land desolate, that none may dwell therein. Then will vast multitudes learn to mourn for sin, and to seek the Lord, and join themselves to him according to his new and everlasting covenant; then will the lost sheep of the house of Israel be brought back into the fold of the good Shepherd, and stray no more. In the mean time, let us rejoice that there is a remnant in every age, who seek him with weeping and supplication: especially, if we be conscious that we are of the number.—They, that would find acceptance with him, must come to his mercy-seat, through the heavenly Advocate: if not acquainted with this new and living way to Zion, they should inquire after it, by reading the word of God and praying for his Spirit; they should also attend the instructions, and seek the counsel, of pious ministers, and cultivate the acquaintance of experienced Christians. Above all, they should “set their faces thitherward,” and walk in the ways of God, as far as they have learned them: for it is absurd and impious to pretend to inquire the way to heaven, whilst men continue in that course of life which they are conscious tends to hell. They that have got some knowledge of the way should be always ready to give instructions to inquirers. Nor ought we willingly to travel the road alone: nay, we should press others to attend us; and desire that both we and they may be joined to the Lord in the most intimate union, as his redeemed servants and worshippers. If we be reconciled to him, according to the tenour of his new covenant by faith in Christ, the blessings will be perpetually, yea, eternally secured to us: our God will never forget his own engagements; and we should continually beseech him not to leave us to forget the duties of our relation to him. Then we shall no more be as “lost sheep, who have forgotten their resting-place,” and exposed to the great devourer of souls; but we shall find rest and safety in God, the Habitation of justice, and the Hope of all the generations of Israel. Nor will he leave us to those wretched shepherds, who cause their flocks to go astray by false doctrine and corrupt examples: or who leave them to wander in ignorance and error, through sloth and negligence; but he will himself feed us with knowledge and understanding. The sins of professing Christians do not excuse the enmity, injustice, and cruelty of those who rejoice in destroying the heritage of God. He that will not save his people in their sins, will never countenance the wickedness of his open enemies, who upbraid them with their crimes, and then commit still viler abominations. We should avail ourselves of opportunities given us of separating more entirely from ungodly persons, and idolatrous and corrupt professors of the Gospel. Every one should be prompt in taking the lead, and setting the example, in such pious singularity: and they, whose office or rank gives them pre-eminence, should be as the he-goats before the flocks.

V. 9—16.

How earnest ought we to be in choosing and securing that good part, that can never be taken from us! For worldly possessions often render men a more desirable and satisfying spoil to the sons of rapine and violence: and they that were chief soon become the hindermost, because of the wrath of the Lord. When he arises to render to sinners according as they have done, accumulated miseries come upon them from every quarter; and every comfort and helper fails and vanishes. Indeed, the people of God seem to fall a defenceless prey to their foes; and one king or nation after another scatters them, as the lion doth the helpless sheep: thus they devour and torment them; they break their bones on racks, burn them in fires, immure them in dungeons, or reduce them to cruel bondage, and refuse to let them go. But persecutors of every age may read their certain doom, in what befel the Assyrians and Chaldeans of old: for “the Redeemer of Israel is strong, the LORD of Hosts is his name,” and he will thoroughly plead their cause, and give them rest, and feed them in his green pastures, and satisfy them with his abundant consolations. He will pardon those whom he reserves, and for ever bury their sins in oblivion, and be propitious to his chosen remnant. But his enemies, after having perhaps been employed as his hammer to dash in pieces their fellow-criminals, will themselves be broken in pieces: they will be taken in a snare, when they least suspect it: their treasures will be robbed, and they led away as fattened bullocks for the slaughter: for it is the work of God, against whom they have dared to contend. The vengeance of his broken law is terrible: and that of his despised or abused Gospel still more so: but the vengeance of his temple, the punishment of those who have used all their power to put down his worship and extirpate his people, is most tremendous:

stretch out mine hand upon thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, * and will make thee a burnt mountain.

26 And they ¹ shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations: but thou shalt be * desolate for ever, saith the LORD.

27 Set ^m ye up a standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the nations, prepare the nations against her, call together against her the kingdoms of ^a Ararat, Mimi, and ^o Ashchenaz: appoint a captain against her; ^p cause the horses to come up as the rough caterpillars.

28 Prepare against her the nations with ^q the kings of the Medes, the captains thereof, and all the rulers thereof, and all the land of his dominion.

29 And ^r the land shall tremble and sorrow: for ^s every purpose of the LORD shall be performed against Babylon, to make the land of Babylon a desolation without an inhabitant.

30 The ^t mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, they have remained in their holds: their might hath failed; they became as women: they have burned her dwelling-places; ^u her bars are broken.

31 * One post shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, ^v to shew the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end;

32 And that ^w the passages are stopped, and the reeds they have burned with fire, and ^x the men of war are affrighted.

V. 25. Babylon stood in a plain: but the immense multitude of the buildings, and the height of the temples, walls, and towers, rendered the city as an artificial mountain. The destruction which was thence diffused to all the surrounding nations, rendered Babylon as a tremendous volcano: but at length the empire and city would be consumed, as it were, by fire; and the Lord would overturn and roll them down, as a burnt mountain, into the ocean, to be found no more. (Rev. viii. 8.)

—Destructing, &c. Or “corrupting mountain, which corrupteth the whole earth.” Babylon was the seat of idolatry, from whence it was derived into other countries; which is remarkably true of mystical Babylon. (Rev. xvii. 5.) We do not find that Babylon was ever destroyed by fire: but that mystical Babylon shall be so destroyed in plain from Rev. xvii. 16. xviii. 8, 9. (Louth.)

V. 26. * There shall not be left an entire stone fit for use. (Louth.) It is a figurative description of the most complete desolation; of being “swept with the besom of destruction,” as Isaiah has expressed it.

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.) Ararat and Mimi are probably the same with the greater and lesser Armenia; Cyrus’s first expedition in this war, was for reducing the Armenians who had revolted, who were obliged to send their usual quota of auxiliaries, to the carrying on of the war. But by Ashchenaz Bochart understands Phrygia and Troas; part of that country being called Ascania by Homer. Cyrus had conquered Cræsus, and several nations from the Egean sea to the Euphrates, before he marched against Babylon. Xenophon informs us, that there were both Phrygians and Cappadocians in his army. (Louth.) Virgil calls the son of Æneas, the Trojan, Ascanius.

Az, &c. That is, in immense multitudes destroying all before them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. Kings. The princes or viceroys of the Median empire, or the kings that were allies and tributaries of the king of Media.

V. 30. ‘Accordingly the Babylonians, after the loss of a battle or two, never recovered their courage to face the enemy in the field again: they retired within their walls; and the first time that Cyrus came with his army before the place, he could not provoke them to venture forth, and try the fortune of arms; and the last time that he came, he consulted with his officers about the best manner of carrying on the siege, since, saith he, they do not come forth and fight.’ (Bp. Newton.)—The Chaldeans were very valiant, when the Lord used them as his hammer or battle-axe; but they became as women, when his vengeance was to be executed on them.

V. 31, 32. Cyrus having spent two years before Babylon, with little prospect of success, and even derided by the inhabitants, at length, having drained the river, divided his army into two parts, and marched them into the city at each end, by the channel of it; and through the brazen gates, at the ends of each street toward the river, which the riotous Babylonians had left open. When the Persians appeared in the city, messengers would immediately be sent to inform the king that the city was taken at one end, (not supposing that the other end was taken also;) and these would meet with one another, and increase the terror and confusion of the inhabitants: but it seems that the troops of Cyrus arrived at the palace before the messengers could inform the king of his danger. They were also to carry information, that the Persians had stopped the passages, and cut off the communication between one part of the city and another: that they had set the reeds on fire, and that the soldiers were so affrighted, as to be incapable of making any resistance. The word translated reeds properly signifies marshes or lakes. —The enemy have burnt up all the outworks, belonging to the marshy grounds about the river.’ Herodotus takes notice, that the extreme parts of the city were taken, before they who dwelt in the middle of it were sensible of the danger. (Louth.) time to thresh her : yet a little while, and e the time of her harvest shall come.

34 Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon hath devoured me, he hath crushed me, he hath made me an empty vessel, he hath swallowed me up like a dragon, he hath filled his belly with my delicates, he hath cast me out.

35 * The violence done to me and to my flesh be upon Babylon, shall the inhabitants of Zion say, and my blood upon the inhabitants of Chaldea, shall Jerusalem say.

36 Therefore thus saith the Lord : Behold, I will plead thy cause, and I will take vengeance for thee ; and I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry.

37 And Babylon shall become heaps, a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment, and an hissing, without an inhabitant.

38 They shall roar together like lions, they shall yell as lions' whelps.

V. 33. Babylon had crushed and trampled on the nations, and especially on the Jews, as the corn was trodden out on the threshing floor : and she was about to endure the like miseries herself. The riches of the nations, likewise, were collected into her, as the sheaves into the floor : but her crimes had made her ripe for divine vengeance ; and the time of her harvest was at hand ; the whole would be carried away by her enemies, as the field is cleared at harvest, and the conquerors would be enriched by her spoils.

V. 34—37. Zion here complains to the Lord of the injuries she had sustained from the Chaldeans : they had devoured the substance, and destroyed the people of Judah ; they had rendered Jerusalem like an empty vessel ; and having gorged themselves, like some voracious animal, with all her precious stores, they cast her and her children out of the land, and carried them into captivity. But this violence done to the children of Zion, and their blood which had been shed, lay upon Babylon as a heavy load : and in avenging Zion, God would waste Babylon, and render it the residence of venomous and hateful creatures alone. (Marg. Ref.) By drying up the sea and springs of Babylon, the destruction of her people, and the total failure of all those resources whence she derived her immense riches, may be meant : and perhaps the draining of the Euphrates may be alluded to ; as all great waters are called seas in Scripture.

V. 38—40. The drunken revels of the Chaldeans would be turned into hideous howlings, when they found their enemies in the midst of them. The Lord so ordered it, that they should be left at this crisis to inflame themselves with wine, at a feast observed in honour of their idols ; that their clamorous rejoicing and intoxication might make way for Cyrus to destroy them when fallen asleep, 39 In ° their heat I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice, and sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake, saith the Lord.

40 I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter, like rams with he-goats.

41 How is ° Sheshach taken ! and how is ° the praise of the whole earth surprised ! how is Babylon become ° an astonishment among the nations !

42 The sea is come up upon Babylon : she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof.

43 Her cities are a desolation, a dry land, and a wilderness, a land wherein no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby.

44 And I will punish Bel in Babylon, and I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up : and the nations shall not flow together any more unto him ; yea, the wall of Babylon shall fall.

and they should wake no more in this world. (Marg. Ref.) For thus God made them sacrifices to his awful justice : while they were exposed to the swords of their enemies, with as little consciousness of the doom which awaited them, as the animals had which were butchered or sacrificed.

V. 41. (Marg. Ref.) Babylon was esteemed the wonder of the world, for the height, breadth, and compass of her walls, and the palace and hanging gardens belonging to it ; for the temple of Belus ; for the banks and facings of the river ; and the artificial lakes and canals made for the draining of it. (Louth.)

V. 42. The multitude of the invaders who came against Babylon was as irresistible as the impetuous waves of the ocean : and her ruin would be as surprising as if the sea had quitted its channel, and had come up to destroy the city.

V. 43. (Note, l. 12—32.) Babylon, and all the adjacent regions, would become uninhabited, uncultivated, and unproductive, like a barren desert.

V. 44. Bel was the chief idol of Babylon, and the destruction of his temple and his worshippers was as his punishment ; and doubtless was a heavy punishment to those ambitious spirits, whom all idolaters worship. The immense treasures of his temple, which had been accumulating for ages, became the property of the conquerors. (Note, l. 2, 3.) (Marg. Ref.) The heathen ascribed the honour of all their successes to their idols ; and upon any great victory, offered the best part of their spoils to their gods, and deposited them in their temples. The restoring of holy vessels to their right owner is here particularly foretold, which was done by Cyrus, upon his proclamation for rebuilding the temple. Xerxes demolished the temple

V. 58. The labour and expense, beyond all computation, that had been employed in erecting the stupendous wall and towers of Babylon, and forming the massy brazen gates, in which numbers had laboured as in the fire, and been wearied even unto death, would all in the event be found vain and useless. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 59. With, &c. "For," or "in behalf of, Zedekiah."

Quiet. Some interpret this word, of Seraiah's office under Zedekiah; but perhaps it refers to his character as a peaceable and pious man; who, (though employed by Zedekiah on some embassy to Babylon,) was ready to perform this service put upon him by the prophet. Seraiah was brother to Baruch. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 61—64. When Seraiah had surveyed the strength, magnificence, prosperity, luxury, pride, and wickedness of this flourishing city, he was ordered to read (probably before the captive Jews,) all the words of this prophecy concerning its entire and final ruin and desolation: and then, to give the greater solemnity to the transaction, and to show his belief of what he had read, he was to sink the book in the Euphrates; declaring that thus Babylon would fall and rise no more; for its inhabitants would be like men fainting with weariness, who can no more resist their assailants. Babylon was in the full height of her prosperity, when this declaration was made, and these predictions could scarcely escape the notice either of the Jews or the Chaldeans at that time, though the event rendered them more generally regarded.

This far. The next chapter seems to have been added by Ezra, or some other person, to illustrate the predictions of Jeremiah, (which are here terminated,) and the lamentations which follow. (Note, 16.) It may be proper very briefly to state a few particulars, concerning the gradual fulfilment of this extraordinary prophecy. 'Notwithstanding these precautions,' (those used by Cyrus to prevent a revolt of the Babylonians,) 'they rebelled against Darius; and in order to hold out to the last extremity, they took all their women, and each man choosing one of them, out of his own family, they strangled the rest, with their children also, that unnecessary mouths might not consume their provisions. They sustained the siege for twenty months. As soon as Darius had made himself master of the place, he ordered three thousand of the principal men to be crucified, and thereby fulfilled the prophecies of the cruelty, which the Medes and Persians should use towards the Babylonians.' B. C. 516. (Bp. Newton.) After this, 1. 'Babylon ceased to be a royal city, the kings of Persia choosing to reside elsewhere.— They delighted more in Shushan, Ecbatana, Persepolis, &c. and did themselves destroy a good part of Babylon. 2. We are informed by Strabo and Pliny, that the Macedonians, who succeeded the Persians,— built Seleucia in the neighbourhood, on purpose to draw away its inhabitants, and to have it deserted. Nothing can better explain what the prophet had foretold,—"It shall not be inhabited." Its own masters endeavour to depopulate it!' B. C. 253. 3. The new kings of Persia, who afterwards became masters of Babylon, completed the ruin of it by building Ctesiphon, which carried away all the inhabitants she had left: so that from the time the anathema was denounced on that city, it seems as if those very persons, who ought to have protected her, were become her enemies; as if they had all thought it their duty to reduce her to a state of solitude, by indirect means, without using any violence. 4. She was so totally forsaken, that nothing was remaining but the walls,— when Pausanias wrote his remarks on Greece, (A. D. 96.) 5. The king of Persia, finding the place deserted, made a park of it, in which they kept wild beasts for hunting, A. D. 490. The site of Babylon could not have been entirely a marsh, or pools of water, at this time? (Note.

The Euphrates, having no longer a free channel, took its course another way. 7. By means of all these changes Babylon became an utter desert so that the most able geographers at this day cannot determine where it stood. (Rollin's Ancient History.) This prophecy, the latest of those delivered against Babylon, has been extant two thousand four hundred years; and all historians, travellers, and geographers, (the persons in all the world the most capable of knowing,) whether Jews, infidels, or Christians; whether papists or protestants, agree that the state of those regions at this day exactly accords with it! So certainly, also, shall the prophecies against the New Testament-Babylon be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—32.

When they that have prospered sink into trouble, those professed friends, who were only attached to their prosperity, often set themselves against them round about: but the Lord is a Friend who changes not, and is especially kind to his people in adversity. Such as delight in war and blood, generally perish by others as bloody as themselves: but "blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God." He will punish his offending worshippers; but that does not excuse their oppressors: for though the land of Canaan was filled with sin against the holy One of Israel; yet the king and people of Babylon had no right to seize upon it, and destroy its inhabitants. The Lord will therefore bring forth the righteousness of those who have been unjustly oppressed; and will plead the cause of his people against those who slander, enslave, or spoil them: and if we have waited for him, and are helped, we should come and declare in Zion his work in our behalf. When he devises evil against sinners, he will easily raise up the spirits of his shosen instruments, that he may effect it: and they that would deliver their own souls, must separate without delay from among the workers of iniquity. The splendid achievements of mighty conquerors, and the majesty of haughty monarchs and oppressive empires, only renders them a golden cup in the Lord's hand, to make the nations mad and miserable: and too often idolatry and iniquity have spread, in proportion to the enlargement of flourishing monarchies. But these have their rise, progress, continuance, and decline: some of them gradually decay; others fall, and are destroyed suddenly and irreparably; and the just judgments of God are conspicuous to all beholders, in their ruin. When riches and prosperity are depended on, and no end is put to men's desires of increasing their possessions, severe calamities may be expected to assign a measure to their insatiable covetousness, and to tear from them their idolized treasures. What idol or created arm can withstand the Creator and Upholder of the world; who is also the Portion of his people! He is able to save and to destroy; and whatever use he makes of ungodly men, he will execute vengeance on them at last; but they who trust, love, and serve him, shall be graciously protected and recompensed.

Whilst God avenges all injustice and oppression, the violence done to the saints and martyrs of Jesus will draw down the heaviest load of vengeance: and in bringing sinners to condign punishment, he needs only leave them to their lusts, and they will make way for their own destruction. Drunken revels and sensual mirth are awful preparations for death; and if men would not fall asleep amidst such excesses, to awake no more but in eternal ruin, they ought not to indulge in them. The wars and desolations which pervade the earth should cause our hearts to mourn; but not to faint or fear: for though violence be in the land, and ruler against ruler, and tremendous slaughter be made, yet the Lord presides, and is preparing to execute judgment on the enemies of his cause, that heaven and earth may sing his praise. We may indeed yet complain of reproach and shame; because the sanctuaries of his house are possessed and profaned by those who are strangers and enemies to his truth and grace: but let us still remember the Lord our God, and pray for the promised and not far distant peace of Jerusalem: let us use every means that he hath appointed, to promote the cause of genuine Christianity; and confidently expect, that Babylon and every Antichrist will soon sink and rise no more for ever. We need not be dismayed at the haughtiness, prosperity, or power of the wicked; or at the prospect of mountainous difficulties in our way: for there is nothing too hard for the Lord. Let us then hope in his word, and quietly wait for his salvation: and then we shall see, but never share, the destruction of the wicked that rise up against us.

the eyes of the Lord, ^d according to all that Jehoiakim had done.

3 For ^e through the anger of the Lord, it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah, till he had cast them out from his presence, that ^f Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon.

4 ¶ And it came to pass in ^g the ninth year of his reign, ^h in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came, he and all his army, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it, and built forts against it round about.

5 So the city was besieged unto the eleventh year of king Zedekiah.

6 And in ⁱ the fourth month, in the ninth day of the month, ^j the famine was sore in the city, so that there was no bread for the people of the land.

7 Then ^k the city was broken up, and ^l all the men of war fled, and went forth out of the city by night, by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden; (now the Chaldeans were by the city round about;) and they went by the way of the plain.

8 But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, ^m and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; and all his army was scattered from him.

9 Then ⁿ they took the king, and carried him up unto the king of Babylon to Riblah, in the land of Hamath; where he gave judgment upon him.

10 And the king of Babylon ^o slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes: ^p he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah.

11 Then ^q he ^r put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and the king of Babylon bound him in ^s chains, and carried him to Babylon, and put him in ^t prison till the day of his death.

12 ¶ Now in ^u the fifth month, in the tenth day of the month, which was ^v the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, ^w captain of the guard, ^x which ^y served the king of Babylon, into Jerusalem, 13 And ^z he burned the house of the Lord, and ^{aa} the king's house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, and all the houses of the great men, burned he with fire.

14 And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, ^{ab} brake down all the walls of Jerusalem round about.

15 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard ^{ac} carried away captive certain of the poor of the people, and the residue of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to the king of Babylon, and the rest of the multitude.

16 But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left ^{ad} certain of the poor of the land, for vine-dressers, and for husbandmen.

17 ¶ Also the ^{ae} pillars of brass that were in the house of the Lord, and ^{af} the bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the Lord, the Chaldeans brake, and carried all the brass of them to Babylon.

18 The ^{ag} caldrons also, and ^{ah} the shovels, and ^{ai} the snuffers, ^{aj} and the ^{ak} bowls, and ^{al} the spoons, and all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered, took they away.

19 And the basons, and the ^{am} fire-pans, and the bowls, and the caldrons, ^{an} and the candlesticks, and the spoons, and the cups; ^{ao} that which was of gold in gold, and ^{ap} that which was of silver in silver, took the captain of the guard away.

20 The ^{aq} two pillars, one sea, and twelve brazen bulls that were under the bases, which king Solomon had made in the house of the Lord: ^{ar} the brass of all these vessels was ^{as} without weight.

22 And a chapter of brass was upon it; and the height of one chapter was five cubits, with net-work and pomegranates upon the chapters round about, all of brass. The second pillar also and the pomegranates were like unto these.

23 And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side; and all the pomegranates upon the network were an hundred round about.

24 ¶ And the captain of the guard took Seraiah the chief priest, and Zephaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the door:

25 He took also out of the city an eunuch, which had the charge of the men of war; and seven men of them that were near the king's person, which were found in the city; and the principal scribe of the host, who mustered the people of the land; and threescore men of the people of the land, that were found in the midst of the city.

26 So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard took them, and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah.

27 And the king of Babylon smote them, and put them to death in Riblah, in the land of Hamath. Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his own land.

23 ¶ This is the people whom Nebuchadrezzar carried away captive: in the seventh year, three thousand Jews and three and twenty:

29 In the eighth year of Nebuchadrezzar, he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred thirty and two persons.

30 In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar, Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons: all the persons were four thousand and six hundred.

31 ¶ And it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, in the five and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, lifted up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison;

32 And spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon:

33 And he changed his prison-garments: and he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life.

34 And for his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, every day a portion, until the day of his death, all the days of his life.

bishop Usher supposes, that this, and the two following verses, give us an account of the lesser captivities which the Jews suffered under Nebuchadrezzar: whereas there were three others, in which many more persons were carried away; viz. in the first year of his reign, (Dan. i. 3.) in the eighth year, (2 Kings xxiv. 12.) and in the nineteenth, when the city was destroyed. (Louth.) (Marg. Ref)

V. 30. This event is no where else mentioned: but it seems that a remnant continued, dispersed in different parts of the land, after Johanan retired into Egypt; and perhaps some escaped from Egypt and joined them: but Nebuchadrezzar at length carried them away also. On any supposition, the numbers mentioned, as carried captive, must appear small, compared with the immense population of the land in preceding times: but it is probable, that many more were removed into other countries, by one means or other: and the miseries and massacres of the Jews seem to have been very tremendous, previous to this catastrophe.

V. 31. Twenty-fifth. (Note, 2 Kings xxv. 27—30.) This advancement might be resolved upon on the twenty-fifth, but not brought to pass till the twenty-seventh. (Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When nations provoke God to give them up to ruin, he leaves their princes to infatuated counsels, which bring deserved punishment on themselves and their subjects. Would we then have wise and successful rulers, we must pray for them, and study ourselves to walk conscientiously before God. When sinners follow one another in the ways of rebellion, it may be expected that God will follow them with similar judgments. Ringleaders in impiety will have the heavier load of misery: external privileges and sacredness of character aggravate the wickedness, and will increase the punishment, of transgressors: and the ruin of churches and nations is often chargeable on the crimes of the leading ministers of religion. But let us, with serious application to ourselves, observe, how certainly the word of God takes effect; and how fatal are the consequences of obstinate iniquity and impiety. Let us consider the manifold changes of this world: that we may mourn even under long continued afflictions without desponding, as we know not what good may be reserved for us; and rejoice in prosperity without presuming, for we know not what fatal reverse may await us. And let us set our affections on things above, where there are no changes, or death, because no more temptation or sin, for evermore.

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

The Jews denominate this Book Echah, (How,) from the first word of the text; or sometimes they call it Kinnoth, (Tears,) alluding to the mournful character of the work. Josephus and other writers, suppose that it was written upon the occasion of Josiah's death. The generality of commentators are, however, of a contrary opinion: and indeed Jeremiah here bewails the desolations of Jerusalem, the captivity of Judah, the miseries of famine, and the cessation of all public worship, in terms so forcible and pathetic that they appear rather applicable to some period after the destruction of Jerusalem, when, agreeably to his own predictions, every circumstance of complicated distress overshadowed Judea.' (Grey's Key.) It is indeed wonderful, that any man, having attentively perused the book, should doubt concerning the occasion on which it was written. The prophet had said, that if the people "would not hear, his soul should weep in secret places for their pride:" and, though the awful catastrophe was a remarkable attestation of his character as a true prophet, and confuted all his opposers; yet his lamentations over it constitute, beyond all comparison, the most tender and pathetic elegy, extant in any language. 'This poem affords the most elegant variety of affecting images that ever probably were collected into so small a compass. The scenes of affliction, the circumstances of distress, are pointed out with such beautiful combination, that we contemplate every where the most affecting picture of desolation and misery. The prophet reiterates his complaints in the most pathetic style; and aggravates his sorrow with a boldness and force of description, that correspond with the magnitude and religious importance of the calamities displayed to view. In the instructive strains of an inspired writer, he reminds his countrymen of the grievous rebellions that had provoked the Lord to "abhor his sanctuary:" confesses that "it was of God's mercies, that they were not utterly consumed;" and points out the sources of evil in the iniquities of their false prophets and priests. He then with indignant irony threatens Edom with destruction for rejoicing over the miseries of Judea; opens a consolatory prospect to Zion; and concludes with an affecting address to God, to consider the reproach of his people, and to renew their prosperity.' (Grey's Key.)—The leading design indeed of this sacred Poem seems to have been, to teach the captive Jews the due medium, betwixt obdurate insensibility and rebellious despondency, under their calamities; to lead them to consider God as the righteous Author, and sin as the deserving cause, of them: to call them to the exercise of submission, repentance, faith, and prayer; to show them the way of finding support under such complicated miseries, and with hopes of promised deliverance, from the mercy of God. This view of the subject will likewise occasionally lead us to look to him, who for our salvation became a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and who, in this and every other duty, hath left us a perfect example that we should follow his steps. (Note, iii. 1.) The nature of the subjects precludes the expectation of direct prophecies, as proofs of the divine inspiration of the poem; except as it introduces and adopts the predictions of other scriptures, and anticipates the accomplishment of them. Neither is it expressly quoted in the New Testament; unless St. Paul intended to refer to it, (Compare iii. 45. with 1 Cor. iv. 13:) but there never was a doubt so much as hinted by the Jews, against its being the genuine work of Jeremiah, and a part of the sacred oracles: and the instructions conveyed in it remarkably coincide with those of the New Testament. Each of the chapters consists of twenty two stanzas; (for no doubt the work is poetical:) Each verse in the first two begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, in regular order; after the manner of some of the Psalms. The third has three short verses to each stanza; each beginning with the Hebrew letters as before; but with one variation as to the order of them. The fourth accords to the first and second: but the fifth, though consisting of the same number of verses, is not arranged according to the initial letters. There are many traditions extant about the death of this prophet; but no great dependence can be placed on them.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The fifty second chapter of Jeremiah was formerly placed as a prologue to this book: —but instead of it, the Greek and Latin copies have a short introduction,—which may be thus translated: "It came to pass, that after Israel was carried captive, and Jerusalem desolate; the prophet Jeremiah sat weeping, and bewailed Jerusalem with this lamentation, and said, &c." This argument was occasioned, as Huetius probably conjectures, by removing the fifty second chapter from the place where it first stood, and placing it at the conclusion of the prophecy of Jeremiah. (Louth.) In these pathetic complaints, the prophet sometimes speaks in his own person; at other times Jerusalem or Zion, as a sorrowing female, is the speaker; and at others a chorus, or collective body of the Jews, is introduced. The reader is also in some places made to witness the miseries of the people during the siege of Jerusalem; then the calamities attending the plunder and destruction of it are presented to his imagination; then he reviews the dreary condition of the city and land, when the desolations were completed, and hears the insults of their enemies over them; or his attention is called to the poor captives at Babylon, as if indeed a spectator of the hardships put on them. Thus the scenes are shifted, so to speak, in such a manner as may best realize to the mind the various and complicated miseries endured by the nation, from the death of Josiah to the completion of the captivity; but especially at the close of that period. The scene here laid is the city, after all the inhabitants were driven out of it, and its buildings were burned, and while it lay in ruins. The prophet had witnessed Jerusalem a populous, prosperous, and tumultuous city; but now viewing her desolate situation, he exclaims, "How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people!" Jerusalem, as a weeping female, sits on the ground, with none to attend or comfort her: the Lord had forsaken her, her king was carried captive, and she was become as a widow. She had been eminent in dignity and authority; and in the days of David and Solomon, several of the surrounding nations acknowledged her as their princess, and rendered her tribute: but she was now become tributary, and was grievously oppressed by the heathen. How had this lamentable reverse in her condition taken place? Without doubt the hand of God was gone forth against her: or her enemies could never have thus prevailed. On these accounts Jerusalem is represented as weeping very sore in the night when others are refreshed by sleep; a continued flow of tears bedewed her cheeks; none of her idols, who had seduced her from God, and had been her paramours in spiritual adultery, could now afford her any consolation; and her heathen allies, whom she had relied on as friends, were treacherously turned to be her enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Here the scene changes, and the nation is considered as another female dragged away to Babylon, a captive and a slave; by reason of those grievous afflictions which sin had occasioned. There she dwelt "in great servitude," among idolaters, at a distance from God's ordinances, bereft of all her comforts, and exposed to every outrage from the insulting victors, who hated her for her relation to JEHOVAH; nor could she there have any rest from labour, terror, and suffering. Her persecutors, who had long pursued her, at length had overtaken her in the straits, where she could not elude or avoid them: and she was entirely exposed to their merciless oppression. even idolaters should treat her with loathing or neglect.— Some parts of this passage, are often quoted, in speaking of our Lord's sufferings ; and they are capable of a striking accommodation : but it should be recollected, that this is only an accommodation, and not the real meaning of the sacred writer. The address is so beautifully pathetic, that no comment can do justice to it.

V. 12—17. Jerusalem or Zion is here introduced, (as in the close of the last verse) sitting dejected and distressed upon the ground ; and, seeing the passengers disposed to neglect or insult her sufferings, she called upon them to consider whether her example did not concern them? Doubtless they ought to consider the greatness of her miseries, that they might sympathize with her ; and the cause of them, that they might take warning and receive instruction. It must be evident that her sorrows were unprece- dented in greatness and variety : and that the Lord himself had done all this to her in his fierce anger. His wrath, like fire from heaven, penetrated, tortured, and consumed her bones, and enervated all her strength. His various judgments, (like a net spread for her feet,) so entangled her that she could not escape ; and if she attempted it, he still turned her back again into the power of her persecu- tors. Thus he had made her destitute and faint with unre- mitted miseries. She had been sold as a slave for her transgressions ; and God himself had bound the yoke, and wreathed it on her neck, so that she could not possibly shake it off: her slavery was the evident effect of her crimes, and was embittered by the sense of his wrath : and he had deprived her of all power to withstand, or escape, the instruments of his righteous vengeance. He had trodden down all the mighty men, who attempted to defend her: he had collected the armies against her, who crushed her young men to pieces: he had given her up into the hands of the besiegers, to be bruised by them, as grapes are when cast into the wine-press. These things extorted her cease- less tears: for God, who alone could comfort her when thus bereaved of her children, was become her enemy, and paid no regard to her supplications, when she spread forth her hands towards him. Nay, he had given command- ment, that her adversaries should surround her, and that

V. 18—22. In the mid-st of all her sufferings, Jerusa- lem was constrained to acknowledge the justice of God, and to condemn herself; for she had rebelled against his commandment. It was therefore worthy of the attention of all people to observe the punishment to which her crimes had subjected her. All confidences failed in the extremity of her trouble: even her priests and elders perished for famine: what then must have been the case with the multitude of her inhabitants? But her inward anguish was most intolerable, through the sense of guilt and of the wrath of God; whilst the sword devoured without, and the famine within the city; (for the scene seems here to be laid previous to the taking of Jerusalem.) It was in vain to look to her former friends, for they had heard of her sorrows, but attempted not to comfort her. And her enemies exulted and rejoiced over her miseries, out of hatred to her religion. She had therefore none to look to but God, and to him she made her appeal; assured that the doom of her enemies was passed, and that the Lord would deal with them as he had done with her because of her transgressions, which had reduced her to so deplorable a condition. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

We shall often be required in this evil world to weep with

CHAP. II.

The prophet describes and mourns over the desolations of Jerusalem and the miseries of the Jews, as brought on them by the just indignation of God, 1—12. He laments over the unequalled sufferings of the people who, by hearkening to false prophets, are exposed to the cruel insults of their enemies; and he calls on the sufferers to join with him in tears and prayers, 13—19. Zion refers her doleful case to the compassionate consideration of God, 20—22.

those that weep, and we should not be reluctant to so salutary an employment. As we now hear the denunciations of the wrath of God against the workers of iniquity; so we shall soon be spectators of their accomplishment; nay, here the serious mind perceives abundant cause to meditate, with solemn awe and deep concern, on the tokens of his indignation at the sins of men. The history of nations, churches, families, and individuals, abounds with fulfillments of the Scriptures. How is it that so many populous cities now sit solitary? That so many flourishing empires are now become tributary and enslaved? Whence are the tears with which vast multitudes wear away their restless nights and joyless days; whilst they mourn the loss of dear relatives, the treachery of professed friends, the cruelty of enemies, the oppression of the powerful, the fury of persecutors, grievous servitude, and multiplied afflictions? Whence is it, that idolaters now occupy the places where flourishing churches once were? That the ways of Zion are deserted, her ordinances interrupted or profaned; her gates desolated; her priests and people in bitterness, or cut off? How is it that the adversaries of the Church are the chief and prosper, and that her children are in captivity? However we may vary our inquiries, the same answer recurs: the fierce anger of the Lord for man's transgressions hath filled the earth with sighs and groans, with tears, sickness, and death. Sin hath slain all the former generations of men; hath murdered our ancestors, relatives, friends, or children; hath aimed many a mortal blow at us, and will certainly effect our death also. Sin hath prepared the place of torment, and filled it with fallen spirits, and with the souls of those who have died unpardoned and unchanged. Sin would as certainly have conveyed all our souls to this place of misery, as all our bodies to the grave; if the Lamb of God had not come to take away the guilt and power of it, from those who believe in him. Sin hath tarnished all the beauty and marred all the glory of our rational nature. Sin fills our consciences with remorse and our hearts with terror; deprives the soul of strength and confidence; perverts every pleasant thing and every good gift of God, and even his truths, sabbaths, and ordinances, into occasions of deeper condemnation and misery. Yet after all, we are disposed to lodge this serpent in our bosom, yea, to entertain it in our hearts, to expect our happiness from it, and to cleave to it as our most valuable treasure! Among the manifold evil effects of sin, the pious mind is peculiarly grieved, when, being committed by professors of true religion, it causes the enemies of God to blaspheme, and to mock and scoff at the truths and ordinances of his word and worship. Wo be to the world because of such offences: and wo be to those by whom such offences come; except their repentance be as deep as their transgressions are aggravated. We ought to prefer any of the other temporal effects of sin to this. Should any be wonderfully brought down from the height of affluence to the depth of penury; should their honour be changed for contempt; should they have no comfort in affliction, and be constrained to part with all their pleasant things for bread to sustain life; nay, should they have the prospect of dying by famine: yet all this ought to be considered as far less afflicting than that their sins should cause the name, truths, and ordinances of God to be blasphemed; and men to stumble and fall and perish for ever, through the increasing prejudice, hardness, and impiety that they have excited. Even the profanation of sacred things, and the sacrilege of those who in different ages have laid their rapacious hands on the substance which was dedicated to the support of religion; and the contempt with which the clerical office hath been treated by profligates and infidels, have in great measure been chargeable upon the atrocious sins of professors and preachers of the Gospel, who have rendered themselves vile, and exposed themselves to shame by their evident misconduct; and therefore the Lord hath made them vile and contemptible even to the most abandoned of mankind.

We cannot derive benefit from our sufferings, unless we look above the instruments and occasions of them, and consider the hand of God in them. He it is, who impoverishes, enfeebles, intimidates, and enslaves men, as he sees good: he treads down and crushes the mighty, the valiant, and the delicate, without respect of rank, of age, or sex. Wars, pestilences, and famines, are his judgments: conquerors, tyrants, and oppressors are his executioners; and he is just in all the miseries which spring from their injustice. We should therefore look to him in all our troubles, and inquire, Wherefore he contendeth with us? we should consider our ways and confess our sins, and mingle our tears of natural grief for our sufferings, with those of godly sorrow for our sins. We should entreat the Lord to consider, and relieve our miseries, and to pardon our transgressions: we should despair of comfort and help from all others, and confidently expect them from his mercy, truth, and power: we should justify him in our sufferings, and condemn ourselves; acknowledging that we have rebelled against his commandment, and that grievously. Thus we should pour out our hearts before him, who regards the sighs and counts the tears of such as mourn for their sins: then will he support us under every stroke of his correcting rod; in due time vouchsafe us deliverance, and render the whole profitable to our souls; he will restore our privileges and comforts, and confound all our enemies.—They who rejoice over the calamities of the Lord's people, should remember, that their day also is coming, when, except they repent of this their wickedness, they will be rendered still more contemptible and miserable. It may therefore properly be inquired of all that pass by, in Zion, and hath despised, in the indignation of his anger, ^a the king and the priest.

7 The LORD hath ^a cast off his altar, he hath abhorred his sanctuary; ^b he hath ^c given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces; ^d they have made a noise in the house of the LORD, as in the day of a solemn feast.

8 The LORD hath ^a purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion; he hath ^b stretched out a line, ^c he hath not withdrawn his hand from ^d destroying: therefore ^e he made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together.

9 Her ^a gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars; ^b her king and her princes are among the gentiles: ^c the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the LORD.

10 The ^a elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, ^a and keep silence: they have ^b cast up dust upon their heads; ^c they have girded themselves with sackcloth; ^d the virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground.

11 Mine ^a eyes do fail with tears, ^b my bowels are troubled, ^c my liver is poured upon the earth, ^d for the destruction of the daughter of my people; ^e because the children, and the sucklings ^f swoon in the streets of the city.

12 They say to their mothers, Where is corn and wine? when they swooned ^a as the wounded in the streets of the city, when their ^b soul was poured out into their mothers' bosom.

13 ¶ What thing ^a shall I take to witness for thee? what thing shall I liken to thee, O daughter of Jerusalem! what shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion! ^b for thy breach is great like the sea: ^c who can heal thee?

V. 6. The temple was, with great violence, as completely destroyed by the Chaldeans, as a tent is removed; and the Lord no more regarded it, than a man does a temporary hut, erected in a garden, and pulled down when it is done with. (Marg. Ref.) The kings of David's favoured race, and the priests of Aaron's consecrated seed, were alike despised by him in his indignation at their sins.

V. 7. 'As the people were accustomed to praise God ^a in the solemn feasts with a loud voice; so now the enemy ^b blaspheme him with shoutings and cries.'

V. 8. A line, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

Lament. 'This is a figurative speech, as that was, when he said, "The ways of Zion lament," (i. 4), ^a meaning that this sorrow was so great, that the insensible things seemed to have their part in it.'

V. 9. The gates of Jerusalem, or of the temple, were laid on the earth, and covered with ruins, as if they had sunk into the ground. The law was no more: for its ordinances could no more be observed; the temple and altar being destroyed, and the ordinances of worship suspended, as if no more to be attended on. Jeremiah himself seems to have survived the desolations of Jerusalem for a considerable time; yet it does not appear, that he delivered any encouraging prophecies to the Jews after that event; and the most of Ezekiel's predictions relating to Israel, (except the obscure vision of the temple, &c. in the last chapters of his prophecy.) were delivered about the time when Jerusalem was destroyed and Judea desolated.—Daniel delivered no prophecy immediately relating to the temporal state of his people, till the seventy years of the captivity were nearly expired. So that there seems to have been, at this period, a very peculiar suspension of that information and encouragement, which the prophets had, for many ages, been employed to communicate to the people. Except Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, no prophet is mentioned, from the beginning to the end of the captivity, when Haggai and Zachariah were raised up.—This chiasm was an evident token of divine displeasure, and must have been a very sensible aggravation of the sufferings endured by the pious remnant.

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. The prophet had wept over the calamities of his people, till he had no more power to weep, and his eyes failed to supply tears, or were almost blinded. (Marg. Ref.) His sorrow occasioned the most painful internal commotion, which greatly affected and disordered his vitals. Violent grief, or other vehement affections, are known to cause excessive bilious disorders, and great evacuations from the gall, which is placed on the liver, and to which the prophet is supposed to refer. He was peculiarly affected by beholding the young children, and even the sucking infants, fainting and dying for hunger and thirst in the streets of the city, whilst none had it in their power to relieve them. The scene is here laid just before the taking of the city.

V. 12. The case of the poor children was as desperate as that of the men, who lay weltering in their blood and expiring of their wounds: for, even whilst they were in the arms of their mothers, and supplicated them for nourishment, they expired for want, dying in a lingering and most deplorable manner.

V. 13. The prophet wanted to comfort his people by some suitable topic; but he could not have recourse to those which were commonly employed on such occasions. For who could be found to testify, that he had seen a city visited with as complicated and dire miseries as Jerusalem?

14 Thy ^a prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee : and ^b they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity ; but have seen for thee ^c false burdens and causes of banishment.

15 All ^d that pass * by ^e clap their hands at thee ; ^f they hiss and ^g wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, ^h Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth ?

16 All ⁱ thine enemies have opened their mouth against thee : they hiss and gnash the teeth : they say, ^j We have swallowed her up : certainly this is the day that we looked for ; we have found, ^m we have seen it.

17 The LORD hath ⁿ done that which he had devised ; he hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old ; ^o he hath thrown down, and hath not pitied ; and ^p he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee, he hath set up the horn of thine adversaries.

18 Their ^q heart cried unto the LORD,

O wall of the daughter of Zion, ^r let tears run down like a river day and night : give thyself no rest ; let not the apple of thine eye cease.

19 Arise, cry out in the night : in the beginning of the ^s watches ^t pour out thine heart like water before the face of the LORD : ^v lift up thy hands toward him for the life of thy young children, ^w that faint for hunger in the top of every street.

20 Behold, O LORD, and ^x consider to whom thou hast done this. ^y Shall the women eat their fruit, and children ^z of a span long ? ^{aa} shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the LORD ?

21 The ^{ab} young and the old lie on the ground in the streets ; ^{ac} my virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword ; thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger ; ^{ad} thou hast killed, and not pitied.

22 Thou hast called as in a solemn day ^{ae} my terrors round about, so that in the day of the LORD's anger none escaped nor remained : ^{af} those, that I have swaddled and brought up, hath mine enemy consumed.

had been ? What misery could he compare and equal with her's, in order to comfort her ? Indeed the breach made on her, (like those made by the irruptions of the sea,) was vast, and irreparable by any human power.

V. 14. The false prophets flattered the people with assurances of peace, and thus encouraged them in their sins ; and their false visions were the causes of their banishment or captivity ; whereas, had they charged their crimes upon their consciences, and called them to repentance, the captivity might have been prevented. The word burdens, though it generally signifies prophecies of heavy judgments, here means predictions in general : for the false prophets ' spake peace when there was no peace.'

V. 15, 16. The idolaters took the words out of the mouth of the Jews, and derided them for glorying in their holy city, and its peculiar protection and privileges. (Marg. Ref.) The combination of scorn, enmity, rage, and exultation, which the conquerors and spectators manifested, when gratified by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, are set before the reader with peculiar pathos and energy. The whole scene is presented to his view, as in some exquisitely finished historical painting : and the insulting multitudes, who surrounded the Redeemer's cross, can hardly be forgotten on the occasion.

V. 17. ' He hath fulfilled those threatenings, which he denounced against us, in the law of Moses.' (Lomth.) — This reference to the ancient predictions against Israel, for their sins, is of great importance ; both as it shows that these prophecies were then extant and well known among the Jews, and that they were understood by the pious remnant exactly as we now explain them. (Notes, Lev. xxi. Deut. xxviii—xxxii.)

V. 18, 19. In the depth of their calamities the people cried unto the Lord, out of the anguish and distress of their hearts : and called on others to lament over the wall of the daughter of Zion, which was about to be levelled with the ground, to complete the desolations. And the prophet permitted them to give vent to their sorrows, and to weep without intermission : but he also excited them to join their nocturnal lamentations with fervent prayers, pouring out their hearts before God, and lifting up their hands towards him ; beginning when the night-watches used to be set, employing the hours in ceaseless prayers and tears, which others spent in sleep ; and pleading for the life of the young children, that they might not all perish with hunger, and the rising generation of Israel be thus entirely cut off. ' As the wall and rampart are said to lament, (8.) because their ruins are objects of lamentation ; so here devout persons direct their prayers to God, as if the ruins themselves did entreat him to take compassion on the miseries of that place, which he had chosen for his peculiar residence.' — ' Offer up thy earnest prayers with tears to the throne of grace ; and send up thy very soul, and thy devoutest affections with them.' (Lomth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20—22. Jerusalem is here introduced as speaking

CHAP. III.

The prophet bitterly bewails his complicated sufferings, 1—20. He acknowledges the mercy and truth of God, and the benefit of afflictions to be a proper ground of paitent hope, 21—36. He exhorts his people to submit to the sovereignty of God, and humbly to turn unto him, 37—41. He mingles complaints with confessions of sin, 42—54. He appeals to God against his enemies, and beseeches him to execute judgment upon them, 55—66.

She entreated the Lord to consider, that he thus afflicted the only people who worshipped him, and were called by his name. Could he then be unconcerned, whilst the women of Zion ate their own infants, as soon as they were born? This intimation thus given fills the mind with the most horror, and implies the greatest possible extreme of earthly misery, inducing desperation and barbarity; and our thoughts recoil from it, as too shocking to be Jwell upon. (Marg. Ref.) Hophai and Phinchas the priests were slain by the sword in the field of battle: but when Jerusalem was taken, the priests and prophets were slain in the sanctuary, and their blood mingled with that of their sacrifices: and to complete their other calamities, the enemies of their nation, at the call of Providence, flocked from all around, to profane the sanctuary, and terrify the worshippers; even as the people had been used to flock together to keep their solemn feasts.

Spun, &c. The margin reads, “swaddled with their hands,” in which sense the word is used in the twenty-second verse. (Lowth.) All the affectionate care and assiduous attention of a mother seems to be meant; yet extreme hunger and desperation induced the most unnatural cruelty to the same endeared object!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The mercy of God is perpetual and immense “towards them that fear him;” but no external relations, privileges, or profession, by which men may be exalted, as it were, to heaven, can avail those who have not the fear of God before their eyes: for they, who think to please the heart-searching God, by hypocritical services, are “a people that have no understanding; and he that made them will not have mercy on them.” For this cause, the Lord “covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger,” “cast down from heaven to earth the beauty of Israel,” swallowed up his habitations, threw down his strong holds, cut off his horn of defence, burned against him as a consuming fire, and fought against him as an enemy. And if he regarded not his temple, the ark of his covenant, or the families of Aaron and David; if he cast off his altar and abhorred his sanctuary, and let the heathen profane his most holy place, when the Jews had defiled them by their sins; what hope can there be, that he will regard any forms, where the power of godliness is wanting? These institutions were of divine authority and of great significancy: whereas many of those things, in which men confide, are human inventions and traditions, unwarranted by the word of God, nay, contrary to it, yet are they persuaded that “the Lord will do them good, because they have a Levite for their priest,” an Ephod, a Teraphim, and a house of gods or carved idols! (Notes, Judg. xvii. 4—13.) But even those doctrines, ordinances, and regulations, which are most exactly scriptural, when scrupulously retained by men destitute of the Spirit of God, are but a lifeless carcass of religion: and when made a cloak for iniquity, God abhors them. So that, in the day of his wrath for national wickedness, he will despise temples and palaces, kings and priests, establishments and forms of every kind. While persons, under heavy afflictions, are allowed to vent their indignation on the injurious instruments of their anguish, conscience is soothed and pride flattered, and some transient and pernicious relief is obtained. It therefore becomes a necessary but painful operation, by repeated admonitions, to turn the thoughts of the afflicted to the hand of God lifted up against them, and to their sins as the source of their miseries; and to show that greater miseries impend, except repentance and forgiveness intervene. This should always be attempted by condoling friends and the ministers of God. Indeed, this requires a delicate and cautious hand: and they are most fit for the work, who actually share the sorrows of the distressed, and mingle compassionate tears with their warnings, instructions, and exhortations.

It is sometimes advisable, to allow those who are in extreme affliction to consider their sorrows as very great; and even to expatiate on the circumstances that most oppress them; and then to give the subject a religious turn, and show that all our sorrows are deserved, and admit of redress; and that the sources of our consolation are far greater than our greatest griefs can be. Indeed, the topics that philosophy suggests on such occasions are very feeble and inadequate: it gives little support to the wounded and distressed heart, to hear that others have suffered the same, or even greater afflictions; that they are the common lot of man, and cannot be avoided; or that it is more becoming to bear up under them, than to complain and repine. But religion brings us more powerful supports, by leading us to consider the mercy of God, his readiness to pardon; his power to support and comfort; his wisdom, truth and love, and the blessed effects of sanctified afflictions. When mourners are brought to cry to the Lord, and pour out their hearts before him; they will not long hang down their heads unto the ground: for he can heal those breaches, which to all others are irreparable; and he will turn our earnest prayers, (though presented with sighs and tears,) into joyful praises. But whilst we contemplate the scenes here set before us, and view the children perishing by famine, slain by the sword, or even made the horrid repast of their frantic mothers, and the prophets and priests slain in the sanctuary of the Lord; whilst we view the enemies of Jerusalem clapping their hands, wagging their heads, gnashing their teeth, and saying, "Is this the city, that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth?" and rejoicing in having at length obtained their advantage against her, and swallowed her up: and whilst on the other hand we consider, that in all this God performed what he had devised and predicted many ages before; and remember for what and to whom he did this; let us learn to shun false teachers, who speak smooth things and prophesy deceits; who do not detect men's iniquities, but flatter them in their sins; and who thus bring ruin on churches and nations, and on the souls of multitudes. Let us fear being deceived; let us beware of hypocrisy, and of trusting in our privileges; let us watch and pray against temptation; and learn to fear God, and walk humbly before him; and "whilst we think we stand, take heed lest we fall."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. The construction of this chapter differs from that of those which have been considered. It consists of the same number of stanzas, according to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet: but every stanza is divided into three parts, or verses, each of which begins with the same Hebrew letter; the first three verses with Alph, the three next with Beth, &c.; and in one instance the order of the letters varies from that which is elsewhere observed. It also forms a distinct elegy, or lamentation, arranged differently from those which precede. The prophet speaks throughout the whole, lamenting his afflictions, seeking out consolatory topics, and giving counsel and encouragement to his fellow mourners. Some indeed understand it to be the language of a chorus of Jews, speaking as one person: but so many passages evidently refer to Jeremiah's own personal trials, that this interpretation seems inadmissible. 'The subject of the chapter is penitential meditations upon the prophet's own calamities, as well as those of the public; together with pious reflections upon the end which God proposes in sending afflictions, and the good use which men ought to make of such chastisements.' (Lowth.) 'I am the man that has seen this great affliction, which the Lord hath in just anger brought upon his people.' (Bp. Hall.) Probably he spake in his own person, as one who, besides his peculiar afflictions, shared largely in those of his nation, and sympathized with them in those from which he was most exempted. He spake of himself as a public character, for the common benefit; being one of many, who thus shared and mourned over the calamities of Israel. We before met with some passages in the writings of Jeremiah, like the bitter complaints of Job; (Marg. Ref.) and we here find various expressions similar to those used by that afflicted and tempted servant of God: and this favours the supposition, that he related the more gloomy and discouraging part of his own experience, and the way in which he found support and relief, as the best method of instructing and comforting his fellow sufferers. In this view of the chapter, we consider the prophet addressing the afflicted Jews, in order to counsel and encourage them; and speaking as one who knew the heart of a mourner, and could sympathize with them. He was the man who had been peculiarly conversant with affliction, having experienced the effects of God's anger, both for his own sins, and as sharing the punishment inflicted on his people. (Notes, Heb. ii. 17. iv. 15, 16.) 'It is worthy to be observed, that Jeremiah, in endeavouring to promote resignation in his countrymen, represents his own deportment under afflictions, in terms which have a prophetic cast; so strikingly are they descriptive of the patience and conduct of our Saviour under his sufferings. The prophet indeed, in the meek endurance of unmerited persecution, was an illustrious type of Christ.' (Grey's Key.) (P.: xxii. xxxviii. lxix. lxxxviii. Marg. Ref.)

V. 2-9. The Lord had not sent his Jews by a man accustomed to ease and indulgence; but by one whom he had led into great darkness and distress, both in his outward circumstances and his inward experience. He had scarcely known prosperity or comfort all his days, but had always been acquainted with grief and sorrow. The Lord had so crossed him in every thing, that he surely thought, (in the hour of temptation,) that he was turned to be his enemy, and continually employed his power to afflict and punish him. By a succession of sorrows his body was emaciated, and he was put to great pain and anguish, as if his bones were broken. God had builded against him, (as the Chaldeans had done against the city,) to exclude all relief from being brought to him, and to prevent his escape. Thus he reduced him to extremities, and surrounded him with the most distressing troubles; which caused him to sink into such despondency, that he was like one cast into a dark dungeon or sepulchre, confined among the remains of the dead, and secluded from the comforts of the living. The entrance of this dismal cave was so barricaded, that he could not get out; he was loaded with a heavy and galling chain to increase his misery; and when in this situation he cried to God for help, he shut out his prayer, and would neither hear him for his own deliverance, nor for that of his people. Thus his path was closed up as by stone-walls, and he was lost in a labyrinth, from which he could not extricate himself. All this seems to refer to the case of the prophet, when in the dungeon and the stocks; and to his inward experience during those trials: but the language is extremely figurative; and might also be intended to represent the state of the Jewish Church, during the most afflictive period. (Marg. Ref.)

Shutteth, &c. 'It is a great temptation to the godly, when they see not the fruit of their prayers, and causeth them to think that they are not heard; which thing God useth to do, that they might pray more earnestly, and the ^o oftener.'

V. 10—13. The prophet seems to have enlarged on his discouragements, preparatory to the account he intended to give of his supports and comforts. In the season of his trouble and temptation, the Lord became terrible to him, as a bear or a lion, that suddenly rushes from its covert upon the traveller, turns him out of his way, or tears him in pieces: for he had made him desolate, destroyed all his comforts, set him as a mark for his arrows, and wounded him by them in his vitals. In speaking of his own sufferings, he also referred to those of the Jews, in which he was so deeply interested: and some expressions may best suit his case, and others that of the people. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—16. In the midst of his other troubles, the prophet was derided and insulted by the people, over whose approaching calamities he so pathetically mourned; and they made him the subject of their profane songs, for which they were at length made a derision and a song to their enemies. Thus the Lord filled him with bitterness, and intoxicated him with the nauseous cup, of which he made him to drink, instead of the cordials that his case seemed to require: and instead of nourishing palatable food, his bread was, as it were, mixed with gravel, which brake his teeth, and put him to great pain when he attempted to eat; and he was covered with ashes, as a constant mourner and penitent.

V. 17—20. Here the prophet, addressing himself to God, complained that he had removed his soul to the greatest distance from peace, and had made him forget prosperity, through a long continuance of adversity. 'So Josoph, speaking of the seven years of famine, saith, that "plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt." (Lowth.) He was even brought to the borders of despair; as if he could have no help from the Lord, or hope in him, both being perished together. These thoughts harassed him, whilst he ruminated on his complicated and bitter troubles; and the more he revolved them in his mind, the greater depression of spirits he experienced; being bowed down not only in humiliation, but in deep dejection, as the word often means. 'Thus with pain he was driven to and fro between hope and despair, as the godly oft-times are, yet in the end the Spirit getteth the victory.'

V. 21—23. Some connect this with what goes before; and our version, (with the paragraph generally placed before the next verse,) and the termination of the distich in the original, favours this interpretation. 'Such was my wretched desponding state; yet I am delivered. I remember my despondency, and am humbled for it; and also my unexpected past deliverances, which encourages my hope for the future.' The generality, however, of commentators connect it with the following verses. 'The reflections, sat down in the following verses, are a sufficient ground for our trusting in God under the severest trials.' (Lowth.) 'I recall to mind these following considerations, and thereupon I conceive hope and comfort.' (Bp. Hall.) This connexion seems most obvious; according to which the prophet, having stated the extremity of his distress and temptation, proceeds to show how he was raised above them. (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. lxxviii.) He recollected, under his temptations, that, as a sinner, he might have been cut off and cast into the pit of destruction, and would certainly have thus perished, but for the mercies of God; while his people would have been totally consumed, and no remnant of them left. As, however, the Lord had mercifully spared him, and had not utterly destroyed them; as his compassions were plenteous and unfailing, and every morning renewed to him, in the continuance of his life and many unmerited benefits: and as God had given many precious promises to Israel, and to every believer, and in his great faithfulness had always performed them to those who trusted in him; so he found there was yet encouragement to hope, and to exercise patience and repentance, in expectation of returning comfort.

37 ¶ Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commandeth it not!

38 ¶ Out of the mouth of the most High proceedeth not evil and good!

39 Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins!

40 Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord.

41 Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens.

42 We have transgressed, and have rebelled: thou hast not pardoned.

43 Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us: thou hast slain, and thou hast not pitied.

44 Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through

45 Thou hast made us as the off-scouring and refuse in the midst of the people;

46 All our enemies have opened their mouths against us.

47 Fear and a snare is come upon us, desolation and destruction.

48 Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water, for the destruction of the daughter of my people.

49 Mine eye trickleth down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission,

50 Till the Lord look down, and behold from heaven

51 Mine eye affecteth mine heart, because of all the daughters of my city.

52 ¶ Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause.

53 They have cut off my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me.

54 Waters flowed over mine head; then I said, I am cut off.

V. 37, 38. The king of Babylon, and such haughty tyrants, may boast of their power, as if it were equal to omnipotence: but still it is God's prerogative to bring to pass whatever he pleases. Nothing is brought to pass, but according to his determinate counsel and foreknowledge:—as he makes men the instruments of his vengeance; so he can restrain their cruelty, when he sees fit. —Calamities come from his will and disposal, as well as prosperity. (Louth.) When therefore the calamities of the Jews had produced the proper effect, the purposes of their oppressors would be frustrated, and they would no longer be able to enslave, or afflict them.

V. 39—41. As all sinners deserve death and destruction, and are exposed to be crushed every moment; so none, whose life is prolonged, who is out of hell and may hope for heaven, hath either right or reason to complain, whilst suffering the temporal punishment of his sins, which is far less than he deserves. The prophet therefore checked his own complaints, and those of his people, and called them to join with him in self-examination and a serious trial of all their ways, that they might discover and repent of all their sins, and return to the Lord, trusting in his mercy and worshipping his name. He reminded them also, not to rest in formally lifting up their hands to God, but to lift up their hearts also, considering the greatness and holiness of Him whose glory filled the heavens, though he condescended to notice their worship on earth.

V. 42—47. Some connect these verses with the preceding, by the word, saying;—"Let us lift up, &c." Saying, "We have transgressed, &c." The prophet, however, proceeded to direct the confessions of his people, and to put words into their mouths. He humbly acknowledged that they had transgressed and rebelled against God; and as he had not pardoned, it was plain they had not repented: this was the cause of all their miseries, of which he led them humbly and submissively to complain to the Lord. He had covered them with his anger, pursued them by his judgments, and destroyed them without pity; and he had so covered himself with a thick cloud, that their prayers could find no admission. The hypocritical prayers of the people for deliverance were rejected; and even the fervent prayers of the prophet in that behalf were discouraged. Thus the Lord made them as the offscouring and refuse of the nations, who insulted and trampled upon them; and opened their mouths in reproaches, menaces, boasts, and blasphemies, against them and their holy religion: and they were overwhelmed with terrors, entangled in snares, and given up to desolation and ruin.

Offscouring. St. Paul plainly alludes to this text, 1 Cor. iv. 13. The apostles, in quoting the Scriptures do not always follow the Septuagint, but now and then make a new translation from the Hebrew. (Louth.)—If the apostle referred to this text, as it is highly probable, this must have been the case; for there is nothing in the Septuagint like his words, which accord entirely with the Hebrew.

V. 48—51. The prophet here again spake in his own person, and of his share in the public calamities. He wept incessantly for the destruction of his people, and of Jerusalem; and must do so, till the Lord should look down from heaven, to regard and redress their calamities. Every object that he saw afflicted his heart, and renewed his sorrows: but especially when he saw the daughters of Jerusalem fallen into the hands of the brutal conquerors, and exposed to every kind of violence, without any protection. V. 52—66. Jeremiah seems here more immediately to speak of his own trials; with reference to the case of his people, and the public calamities of the church. He had given no cause to his enemies to hate him: and yet they eagerly chased him as a bird, in order to destroy him. They thought they had cut him off, when they had let him down into the dungeon, and covered him over with a great stone, as if buried alive: and he seemed to himself as certainly cut off, as if the waters had flowed over his head. Yet out of this low dungeon he had called upon the Lord: he had pleaded with him that he had heretofore heard his voice; and entreated him that he would not now hide his ear from his sighs, and the breathings of his soul in prayer. God had been used to draw near to him when he prayed; to silence his fears, to plead his cause, and rescue his life; and to him he had appealed in that emergency. He had seen the wrong done to his servant, and knew the vengeance, the devices, and imaginations of his persecutors, with all their calumnies and reproaches; and that he was their constant derision and contempt. He had therefore besought the righteous Judge to plead his cause; which he thus unreservedly committed to him. The verbs in the concluding verses are all future, not imperative; a prophecy, and not an imprecation; what Jeremiah foresaw and foretold, without so much as a hint that he desired or prayed for it. "Thou wilt render them a recompense, &c." "Thou wilt give them a sorrow," or obstinacy, "of heart, thy curse upon them. Thou wilt persecute and destroy them," &c. Even the Septuagint renders the passage in this manner; and it is hard to say what has induced modern translators in general to give it the form of a most tremendous imprecation. The event had fully proved that the Lord had heard and answered Jeremiah's prayer from the dungeon: and this might well encourage the church, in her deep distress and misery, when she was as it were cast into the pit, overwhelmed, and ready to perish, amidst the insults and contempt of her enemies, to expect deliverance from the power and mercy of God, in answer to the prayers of her afflicted sons, and attended with the predicted vengeance on her persecutors. This seems to be the intention of the prophet. For if God had not disregarded the cries of one afflicted servant, could it be supposed that he would leave his whole church to sink for ever in her trouble, and not answer the prayers of all his people, and avenge them on their oppressors?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20.

They are best qualified to administer counsel and consolation to the afflicted, who have themselves experienced the smart and terror of the rod of divine wrath: and therefore ministers often pass through trials, that they may learn to speak seasonably to the afflicted; (2 Cor. i. 4—6.) It is very profitable, in speaking to the troubled and wounded in conscience, to show them what troubles and temptations we have been delivered out of; and in what way we have been led to peace and confidence in God. The suffering and tempted believer has very different views of the Lord's dealing with him, whilst in the midst of his conflicts, than at other times: the struggle betwixt unbelief and faith, flesh and spirit, is often very sore: and outward troubles concur with inward discouragement. Indeed the Lord sometimes leads his most eminent servants into darkness and not into light; and they are apt to conclude that he is punishing them as an enemy, and not correcting them as a Father; his hand seems turned against them all the day; the body is affected with the disquietude of the mind; God himself seems to exclude their souls from comfort, to put them to pain, to hedge up their way, to shut out their prayers and earnest cries, to plunge them into perplexity, to envelop them in darkness, and to appear in every way formidable to them. But whether our God frown or our enemies deride and insult; or whether our comforts be turned into gall and wormwood, or our souls forget prosperity, we may be assured that it is our infirmity and temptation, if we think that "our strength and hope are perished from the Lord." Indeed, if we only consider our affliction and misery, or the power, justice, and holiness of God, compared with our guilt and pollution; and do not view him on a mercy-seat and ready to forgive; instead of being properly humbled before him, we shall sink into despondency. Thus conscious guilt may even swallow us up in over much sorrow, and give Satan an advantage against us ; and it is of great importance to be aware of his devices. But if we properly recal to mind the Lord's goodness, we shall yet have hope in our darkest hours : and we should consider how others have found comfort in similar circumstances, that when we too have found relief, we may point it out to our brethren also.

V. 21—41.

The due consideration of the evil of sin and our own sinfulness, will convince us that " it is of the LORD's mercies " that we are not consumed." If they had not been more abundant even than our provocations, we should not now be in the land of hope, of pardon, of prayer. And how much worse might it have been with us than now it is ! How many have been cut off, and perished in their sins ! How many on earth are suffering more severe pains than we are ! How many sufferers have no acquaintance with their guilt and danger ! and what severe and long-continued self-denial hath God often required of his most honoured servants, which they found it their wisdom and duty, and eventually their happiness, to submit to, in humble patience ! How much then is it our's to bear our lighter cross, and exercise that moderate self-denial to which he calls us ! And how shameful if we repine, despond, or seek relief by sin ! These and similar reflections will suggest reasons even for gratitude in our afflictions, and for hope in our dejections. He who hath hitherto spared us, and whose compassions are new to us every morning, yet waiteth to be gracious : great is his sincerity in his invitations, and faithfulness to his promises ; and he hath promised to teach and help all who desire to come, as well as to receive all that do come to him. If we cannot then say, with unwavering voice, " The LORD is my Portion : " may we not say, " I desire to have him for my Portion and Salvation, and in his word do I hope ? " We may wait on and seek him, assured of success. Let us then watch against despondency, as well as presumption ; and count it " good to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the " LORD." We should also remember, that many have found the galling yoke of affliction salutary and useful ; and in the severe school of adversity have learned repentance, patience, and godliness. As that is always best for us which most tends to the salvation of our souls ; we cannot too soon be initiated in this profitable discipline. Happy then is it, when disappointments and troubles teach young persons to retire, to sit alone, to keep silence from vain words, and to give themselves to meditation and prayer ; whilst others of their age are running the round of folly and vice, and making work for future anguish and misery. And happy shall we all be, if we so learn to receive affliction, considering that it is laid upon us by the hand of God, as to extract good out of it. In order to this we must abase ourselves before him, in the deepest humiliation : and then, whatever reproach or injurious treatment we receive, we shall be conscious that we have no cause to complain, whilst we have the hopes of his favour, and are thus made partakers of his holiness. This submission, and dependence on God, must be safe and advantageous : for he will not cast off for ever any who trust in him. Though he cause grief, he delighteth in mercy, and not in afflicting the children of men ; and when he hath humbled and proved us, he will have compassion, according to the multitude of his mercies, and do us good at the latter end. Indeed, he often permits the instruments of his correction, or his vengeance, to crush their subjects, or prisoners under their feet : but he cannot approve of injustice or oppression. Nor can they exceed their commission, or do mischief according to their own will : for, good and evil are dispensed at the mouth of God. When therefore his wise and righteous ends are answered, he terminates the power of oppressors, and rescues the oppressed. Our troubles are all from him : and when our peace is made with him, all things will certainly work together for our good. Instead then of fretting and complaining, when we suffer a small part of the punishment due to our sins : whilst the continuance of life gives ground for hope and time for prayer ; we should employ ourselves in searching and trying our ways, in repenting of our sins and returning unto the Lord ; and in lifting up our hearts and prayers unto our heavenly Father. We should complain to him, and not of him, and the representation of our sorrows should be always accompanied with humble confession of our transgressions.

V. 42—66.

If the Lord has not pardoned our sins, we may be sure, that it is because we have not repented and believed his Gospel : yet we may be forgiven, even though we have not the comfort of it. If we be covered with his anger, and our prayers be not answered : it may be, because we ask amiss, or have not patiently waited his time. If we be made the filth of the world, treated as the refuse of mankind, and insulted by our neighbours : we should more earnestly look to our God, and expect him to plead our cause and deliver us. But indeed our own troubles, and those of the church and world around us, continually suggest causes of sorrow : and wherever we look, our eyes may affect our hearts, and cause our tears to flow afresh. Yet we may still hope and rejoice in the Lord : no dark dungeon, or deep pit, can exclude us from his throne of grace. If we cannot speak, he will hear our breathings and our sighs. He will draw near to encourage, to defend, and to plead the cause of his afflicted servants, and to redeem their souls. But at last what are all our sorrows compared with those of the Redeemer ? " He " indeed " was the man who saw affliction, by the rod of the " Lord's wrath " against our sins ; and exclaimed, " My

Thus will he deliver his people out of every trouble, and revive his church from every overwhelming persecution: thus will he raise our bodies from the grave, and save us with an everlasting salvation; whilst all his enemies will perish with an eternal destruction from his presence.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The nation of Israel, being devoted to and beloved of God, and Jerusalem, the holy city where he was worshipped at his temple, had excelled other nations and cities, as the most fine gold doth the baser metals; which was intimated by the gold that overlaid the walls, and formed the vessels of the sanctuary. But they were now both polluted by their sins, and disgraced by their sufferings; they had lost all their distinguished splendour and excellency, and were become base and contemptible. The temple also was totally destroyed, and its stones were thrown among the common rubbish, and mixed with the ruins of other buildings. Nay, the sons of Zion, even the most honourable and eminent of them, who ought to have been, and had been, precious as fine gold, were disregarded and dashed in pieces like the meanest earthen vessel.

V. 3—5. Through urgent famine, the women of Jerusalem seemed to be deprived of all natural affection, and were become more unfeeling to their offspring than the sea-monsters or other savage creatures. In endeavouring to preserve their own lives, they neglected to tend on their infants; and thus left them to perish, as the ostrich doth her eggs, which she leaves on the sand and looks no more after: and some of them were even far more cruel, (10.) Thus the sucking child was parched to death by thirst; the lisping children begging for bread were left to perish by hunger; and such as had been brought up most delicately and with every indulgence, lay neglected in the streets or upon dunghills, without other lodging, or other food than they could rake out of them.

V. 6. Sodom was destroyed at once by fire from heaven, and its inhabitants did not suffer so much in this world, as those of Jerusalem did, when they died in a lingering manner by famine, like criminals who are kept long in torture. And, considering the superior advantages and privileges of Jerusalem, there can be no doubt but their guilt was more aggravated than that of Sodom. This indeed is the more obvious sense of the original; (Marg.) The punishment of Jerusalem was heavier than that of Sodom; because her guilt was more aggravated. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, Num. vi.) The Nazarites, during the time of their separation, were considered as very distinguished persons; and probably they used to wear white cloathing. Perhaps God had been pleased to give a peculiar blessing to their diet, to render them more healthy than their brethren who did not abstain from wine, so that their appearance was more vigorous and comely; and they were considered as the ornament and honour of the city. (Notes, Dan. i. 8—15. Am. ii. 11.) But now the wrath of God had made such a change in their circumstances, that by famine, disease, and neglect, they were become base and sordid in their persons and apparel, not to be distinguished from the other wretched objects with whom they were surrounded; and they were emaciated and enfeebled, so that their very neighbours scarcely knew them.

V. 9. Stricken, &c. ‘Their vitals are pierced through, as if with a sword; but with this difference, that it is by famine, the most cruel, because the most lingering, death.’ (Louth.)

V. 21, 22. The Edomites insulted and rejoiced over the calamities of the Jews. (Ps. cxxxvii. 7.) The prophet therefore ironically bade them rejoice ; but assured them, that their joy would soon be terminated : for the deadly cup of divine vengeance would soon be put into their hands, and reduce them to desperation and contempt. The appointed punishment of Zion would soon be completed, and their captivity terminated : and then the Lord would bring to light and punish the iniquities of Edom, or carry them into captivity for their sins. (Marg. Ref.)

No more. — These and such like expressions, if understood in a strict literal sense, must relate to the final restoration of the Jews. (Louth.) Edom is frequently introduced, as representing the enemies of the church in general ; and the final restoration of the Jews will be accompanied with the entire ruin of all the adversaries of the church, or speedily succeeded by it. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The glory of outward distinctions and privileges may soon be obscured ; sin tarnishes the beauty of the most excellent gifts : and when the Lord leaves churches or nations, their glory is departed. But that "gold tried in the fire" which Christ bestows, will never be taken from us ; (Rev. iii. 18 ;) nor can its excellency be diminished. The stones of the earthly sanctuary were repeatedly poured out in the streets, so that not one of them was left upon another : but the spiritual temple experiences no such demolitions ; it is built upon a Rock, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail ; and every believer being one with Christ, is "an habitation of God through the Spirit." Indeed the most precious of the sons of Zion, incomparably more valuable in the sight of God than the finest gold, are esteemed by ungodly men as earthen pitchers, fit for nothing but the basest uses, or to be dashed in pieces ; and not only were prophets and apostles treated in this manner, but even Christ himself was despised and vilified more than any of them. They who live themselves and bring up their children, in delicacy, elegance, and splendour, know not to what miseries they may be reserved : and such, as are most habituated to luxury and indulgence, must be doubly miserable, if reduced to the extremes of hunger, and thirst, and squalid penury, to lie on the ground and to embrace dunghills. It is therefore our interest to accustom ourselves to hardship, to deny our appetites improper gratifications, and to fear contracting such habits as may afterwards prove sources of misery. Extreme necessity has a tendency to render the heart callous and unfeeling : they who have improperly indulged their children when in prosperity, have often been most regardless of them in distress ; and the human species has frequently been found more cruel and insensible than the most ferocious and stupid of the irrational creatures. The punishment of the most abandoned heathens will be light, compared with that of wicked nominal Christians : but, if the lingering pains of a tedious execution, of famine, or some fatal disease be so terrible ; what will be the everlasting punishment of the wicked, when the Lord shall accomplish his fierce anger, and pour out his fury upon them as consuming fire ? No enemy can prevail against us, unless he withdraw his protection : and if he do, no defence can avail. But the wickedness of those who are by office engaged to support religion, and yet betray her interests, is the great cause of national judgments, and of the ruin of flourishing churches : especially, when they have shed the blood of the just in the midst of them. They who have thus polluted their garments, have commonly been recompensed in the same way ; and rendered an execration even to the vilest of mankind. The eyes of those who have provoked the Lord to have no more regard to them, must fail, in looking for vain help from those that cannot save : but they that trust in him shall never be confounded. Such as are most presumptuous in prosperity, are most apt to despond in danger and trouble : and they who have before despised the warnings and counsels of the Lord's ministers, are often excessively terrified, when their end draws nigh and their days are fulfilled ; and when they can find no escape from the close pursuit of the king of terrors. If we so overrate any creature, as to account it "the breath of our nostrils," or to expect "to live under its shadow," we shall surely meet with disappointments and confusion : but our anointed King is indeed the Life of our souls, and we may safely live under his shadow, and rejoice in him in the midst of all our enemies ; for he is the true God, and Eternal Life. All the troubles of the church will soon be accomplished ; and believers ere long will have done with captivity, punishment, sin, and sorrow : but the doom of their insulting enemies approacheth ; the Lord will soon bring their sins to light ; he will put the cup of vengeance into their hands ; and they shall drink it to the dregs, and lie down in eternal shame and sorrow.

V. 19-22. In this deplorable case, the people of God could apply to none but their everlasting and unchangeable King, whose throne remained from age to age. They therefore anxiously inquired of him, wherefore he had so long forsaken, and seemed to forget them? They besought him to convert them unto himself, by his renewing grace; that he might return to them in mercy, and renew those prosperous days, which their nation had anciently enjoyed; and they complained, that he had utterly rejected them in his anger; or rather they inquired whether he meant thus to deal with them? 'Our only hope is in the eternity and unchangeableness of thy nature; and that thou still governest the world; whereby thou always art able to help us, and art never forgetful of the promises which thou hast made to thy people.' 'Do thou give us the grace of conversion and amendment.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In all troubles prayer is our great duty and the best means of relief; and all our sorrows should lead us to beseech the Lord to remember and help us. Though our sins and his just displeasure have caused our sufferings; yet we may hope in his pardoning mercy, his sanctifying grace, and his kind providence. As wasting wars, terrible famines, and heavy oppressions or persecutions come upon nations, for the sins of former and present generations, when their appointed measure of iniquity is filled up: so the accumulating sins of a man's whole life will be punished with tremendous vengeance at last; except he obtain an interest in Him "who bare our sins in his own body on the

"tree." The wrath of God turns the sinner's mirth into mourning, his liberty into bondage, and his honour into disgrace: for this the crown is fallen from our heads, and we unto us that we have sinned! This first reduced the race of men to its present wretched condition; and the desolations of the church originate from the same source.—But though we should mourn over the miseries of the world and the low estate of the church: yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remaineth for ever, even as the throne of our God in heaven. This inheritance cannot be forfeited or alienated; nor can our mansions be possessed by strangers; or our relation to God, as espoused and adopted into his family, abrogated; or the liberty, wherewith Christ hath made us free, taken from us; the freeness of our salvation disannulled; or our joy and glorying in Christ made void. Various tribulations may make our hearts faint and our eyes dim: but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God still is open; and we may beseech him not to forsake or forget us; and plead with him to turn, and renew us more and more by his grace; that our hopes may revive and our consolations abound, as in the days of old. For the eternal and unchangeable God will not utterly reject his church or any true believer, whatever our trials, fears, or lamentations may be. Let us then, in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in his mercy; let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before him; and let us watch against repinings or despondency, whatever we suffer, or witness of the troubles of our brethren; for this we surely know, that it shall be well in the event with all who trust, fear, love, and serve the Lord.

PROPHET EZEKIEL.

Ezekiel, (like Jeremiah,) was a priest as well as a prophet. He executed his office among the captives in Chuldea, during the latter part of the time that Jeremiah was employed at Jerusalem, and till some time after the destruction of that city. He seems to have been carried into captivity with Jehoniah, and he dates his prophecies from that event: though he was not called to the prophetic office, till the fifth year after; and probably, in the thirtieth year of his age (i. 1;) though some reckon this thirtieth year from Josiah's reformation, when he and Judah solemnly covenanted with God to be his people. The scope of his predictions was very similar to that of Jeremiah; but his manner was exceedingly different: for he delivered his messages with a vehemency, energy, and even terror and severity, peculiar to himself, but very suitable to the character of those to whom he prophesied: yet he seems to have been especially raised up, to animate and encourage the pious remnant among the captives, with the hope of returning prosperity; and to satisfy them that their condition was vastly preferable to that of their brethren in Judah, against whom he predicted still more tremendous judgments, terminating in the desolations of the temple of Jerusalem and Judah, and almost the extermination of the inhabitants. Some frivolous objections, grounded on gross mistakes, have been started to the authenticity, or divine inspiration of this book: but the prophecies contained in it, which have been most surprisngly fulfilled, and are fulfilling at this day, constitute a full demonstration, that Ezekiel "spake as he was moved by the Holy Spirit;" especially his prophecies concerning Tyre and Egypt, (Notes, xxvi—xxxii.) It contains also many predictions, which are not yet fulfilled, relating to the restoration of Israel, and the triumphs of the Church over all her enemies; which on careful investigation, will be found entirely to coincide with many parts of Isaiah's and Daniel's prophecies; and those contained in the Revelation of St John (Notes, xxxvi—xxxix.) There are also several evident references to it, in the New Testament; though it is not expressly quoted. (Compare i. x. with Rev. iv. v—ix. 4. with Rev. vii. 2, 3:—and ix. 6. with 1 Pet. iv. 18.) Nor is there any doubt, but its prophecy formed a part of the sacred canon, in the days of our Lord and his Apostles. Some have observed, that the prophet's name was happily expressive of his character; as it may signify, the strength, or courage of God. Many parts of the book, however, are very figurative and obscure; and some, of which no solution entirely satisfactory seems to have been hitherto given. It opens with an account of an emblematic vision of the Lord, by which Ezekiel was called to the prophetic office. It then contains several visions, representing the calamities coming on the Jewish nation, and the Lord's departure from his temple; connected with severe reproofs of the enormous wickedness both of the Jews at Jerusalem, of the captives, and the whole nation, with their kings, princes, priests, and prophets, and awful predictions against them. Having then predicted the judgments of God against the surrounding nations, the prophet changes his style, gives both Judah and Israel intimations of great mercies in reserve; and foretells the destruction of the enemies of the Church in the latter ages: and he concludes with a remarkable vision of the temple, city, and holy land; which it is probable is an emblematical description of the prosperity of the Church in the Millennium. The whole prophecy is suited to fill the mind with awe of God's purity and justice, and hope in his mercy, and with dread and hatred of sin; and to lead the thoughts to Christ and his kingdom; and to encourage our hopes of glorious success to the cause of God on earth.

CHAP. I.

The time, place, and manner, in which Ezekiel was called to the prophetic office, 1—3. The vision of four living creatures, and four wheels, 4—25; and of the glory of God above them, 26—23.

NOW it came to pass in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, that the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God.

2 In the fifth day of the month, which was the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity,

3 The word of the LORD came expressly unto Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi, in the land of the Chaldeans, by the river Chebar; and the hand of the LORD was there upon him.

4 And I looked, and, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north, a great cloud, and a fire \ddagger infolding itself, and a brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof as the colour of amber, out of the midst of the fire.

5 Also out of the midst thereof came the likeness of four living creatures. And this was their appearance; they had the likeness of a man

6 And every one had four faces, and every one had four wings.

7 And their feet were straight feet; and the sole of their feet was like the sole of a calf's foot; and they sparkled like the colour of burnished brass.

8 And they had the hands of a man under their wings on the four sides; and they four had their faces and their wings.

9 Their wings were joined one to another; they turned not when they went; they went every one straight forward.

10 As for the likeness of their faces, they four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side;

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1-3. Some interpreters compute this "thirtieth year," from the reformation in the reign of Josiah: when a new Era commenced, and another trial was made of the kingdom of Judah. Others compute them from the accession of Nabopolassar to the throne of Babylon, which formed a new Era to the Chaldeans, coincident with that of Josiah's reformation: but others think that the prophet only meant that he was thirty years of age, before he was called to his important office. This was in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, with whom Ezekiel seems to have been carried away; and consequently it was in the fifth year of Zedekiah's reign, about six years before the final desolation of Jerusalem. The captive Jews seem to have been left some time without prophets, or visions from God, that might supply the want of the more ordinary means of instruction; (Jer. xxix:) but at length the Lord raised them up a prophet in their captivity.—Ezekiel was among the other captives by the river Chebar, (which probably was some river that ran into the Euphrates;) where they might be stationed by the victors to cultivate waste lands, or to carry on some manufacture for their benefit. Here he saw the heavens opened; and the extraordinary appearance of the firmament made way for the visions of the God of Israel. Thus the word of the Lord came to him expressly, with clearness and conviction; so that he could neither doubt of its divine authority, mistake its import, or question his appointment to the prophetic office. Some suppose, that the personal Word, or Son of God, came and spake to him, in a distinct and audible voice, as doubtless he afterwards did: (26. ii. 3.)—This revelation was accompanied with "the hand of the LORD upon him." This may denote a divine power overcoming his reluctance to the arduous work, encouraging him to enter on it, and qualifying him for it. Or, that he was so impressed by the power of God, as to have his senses closed to external objects, and his mind prepared to contemplate the heavenly visions.

V. 4. The prophet having fixed his attention on the objects presented to his view, first "saw a whirlwind come "out of the north:" this might denote the impetuous destruction, which from Babylon was about to overwhelm Jerusalem and Judah. (Marg. Ref.) This whirlwind brought with it a great cloud; an emblem of the darkness of the Lord's dispensations, and of the heavy judgments that impended over the Jewish nation. Along with this was a fire infolding itself, or kindling itself, or burning incessantly; this might represent the justice and holiness of God, and the awful vengeance he was about to execute, for the glory of his perfections, and from motives taken from and centering in himself. The whirlwind, cloud, and fire, were similar to the tremendous appearances from mount Sinai, at the giving of the law; and intimated that the same glorious God was about to come, and inflict condign punishment on the transgressors of it. This fire diffused a brightness round about it; and from the midst of it was seen as the colour of amber, or, as some explain it, of a polished mixed metal; which might signify, that there is light enough afforded to discern something of the divine counsels and operations; and that, as far as we can understand them, they appear very splendid and glorious.—'Out of the midst of the fiery splendour, there was, as it were, a shining colour of amber, to signify the presence of God's powerful grace and mercy, in the midst of the fiery trials of his Church.' V. 5—14. Out of the midst of the glorious vision, the prophet saw the likeness of four living creatures. These seem to have been emblems, or an hieroglyphical representation, of the holy angels, the attendants on the King of Glory, and the ministers of his providence. They were four, probably to denote that they were employed in all the four quarters of the world, or to the four winds of heaven. Their appearance in the likeness of a man denoted that they were intelligent and rational creatures, of which that form is to us the token. But each of them had four faces, which seem to be emblematic of their endowments and characters. The face of a man implied that they possessed knowledge, foresight, prudence, compassion, and philanthropy: that of a lion intimated their boldness and force, in executing the will of God; that of an ox denoted strength, unwearied diligence, and perseverance; and that of an eagle spiritual sagacity and heavenly affections, by which they soared aloft above all created objects, to the uncreated source of holiness and felicity. Compare Revelation iv. 6, where our translation renders the word zōa, beasts, whereas it should be rendered living creatures; the better to distinguish them from the anti-Christian beast, always expressed in that book by enimian. — In that text the four living creatures denote some part of the Christian Church, as appears by comparing the place with Rev. v. 8, 9. (Louth.) Indeed it seems capable of full proof, that the ministers of the Gospel are hieroglyphically described by the apostle; (Notes, Rev. iv. v.) and this being evident, some learned men have concluded, probably on insufficient grounds, that Ezekiel's vision had a similar meaning, (Note, x. 1, 2.) But the four faces, which each of these living creatures had, are divided, one to each, among the living creatures which the apostle saw: and this difference may imply, that the endowments, which are divided in various proportions among the holiest men on earth, are all conjoined in the holy angels. These living creatures were also represented with four wings each; being emblematic of the activity and celerity with which they executed the divine mandates: as their hands under their wings were of their skillfulness or dexterity, in all their services, of which at the same time they made no ostentation. The hand being peculiar to mankind, among the fire was bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning.

14 And the living creatures ^f ran, and returned, as the appearance of a flash of lightning.

17 When they went, they went upon all living creatures, and the chief instrument of all artificial operations. (Louth.) Their wings being joined together might denote the perfect unanimity which prevails among them; and their going straight forward without turning, their steadiness and constancy in obedience. — They needed not to turn their bodies, that their faces might stand the way they were to go; for go which way they would, they had a face that looked that way. This signifies that nothing ever diverted them from fulfilling God's commands. (Louth.) Their wings, stretched upward, represented their promptitude to execute their Maker's orders; as those, with which they covered their bodies, did their conscious imperfection and meanness in his glorious presence. Their straight feet might be emblematic of simplicity and uprightness; as the sole of their feet, divided like that of the calf or other clean animals, might be of their perfect purity and holiness; and their sparkling like the colour of burnished brass, seems to represent their superior excellency and dignity. They were also represented as going whither the Spirit was to go: which might signify the subserviency of their ministrations in the providential government of the world, to the great concerns of religion and the prosperity of the Church. Their appearance was like burning coals of fire and the appearance of lamps: which might denote their ardent zeal and love, connected with equal knowledge and wisdom. The lamps, or light, going up and down among the living creatures, might intimate, that the Fountain of Light communicated to them severally, as he pleased: and the bright fire issuing forth, as lightning, might be an emblem of the terrible effects of their ministry on the objects of the divine vengeance; or it might signify the same as their running and returning like a flash of lightning, with inexpressible velocity. (Marg. Ref.) Each of the Seraphim in Isaiah, (vi.) had six wings; and so had the living creatures, seen by the apostle: but those seen by Ezekiel had but four. In those texts, — the Seraphim and the living creatures, use two of their wings to cover their faces, out of reverence to the divine presence, before which they stand; whereas here the living creatures are supposed to stand under the throne, as supporting it. V. 15—25. As the living creatures seem to be emblems of the hosts of angels, ministering to the God of Israel: so these wheels denote the mysterious dispensations of his providence. These are as the wheels of a chariot, in which Jehovah rideth to execute the purposes of his own will; and by them his presence and power are manifested in every place. The shape of wheels, and their aptitude for continual motion, represent the constant revolutions of human affairs, under the conduct of Providence. Those persons or communities, which to day are at the top of the wheel, may to-morrow be at the bottom, beyond all human expectation or prevention: yet in the midst of apparent confusion, and whilst every thing seems hurried on by blind chance or fatal necessity, the most perfect regularity is observed, and the changes are directed by as fixed laws, as those which regulate the motion of wheels. Whilst the prophet was contemplating the living creatures, he saw, (upon the earth, to denote that the vision related to the affairs of this lower world,) one wheel by each of them, like the four wheels of a chariot. The appearance and work of the wheels was like unto the colour of a beryl; the wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God's providential government, might be denoted by the exquisite workmanship and beautiful colour of the wheels. The colour here intended is supposed to have been the green of the sea-water; which some think an emblem of the perpetual vicissitudes of human affairs; as the ocean is sometimes agitated by furious storms, and then sinks into a calm. The four wheels were all formed alike; for there is a consistency, and even uniformity, in the dispensations of Providence. But there was also, "as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel;" perhaps a smaller wheel connected with, and put in motion by, the larger; an emblem of the connexion of causes and effects, with great apparent intricacy and almost endless variety, which are governed by the sovereign will of God. Or, by one wheel passing through another of the same size at right angles, provision was made, that nothing should interrupt or retard their progress. So that when the wheels moved, they went on their four sides: or moved steadily in their proper places, without deviating or being diverted from their course by any impediments. The rings of the wheels were so high, and their circumference was so immense, that they were dreadful to look upon: an emblem of the vast designs of Providence, full of incomprehensible mysteries, to be humbly adored by us, and involving many terrible judgments on the workers of wickedness. But these rings were full of eyes all round about: which signified, that infinite knowledge and wisdom ordered every dispensation, and that the purposes of God could not be disappointed by any unforeseen conjuncture. As the living creatures went where the Spirit was to go, so the wheels followed the living creatures: for the same Spirit actuated both the living creatures and the wheels; and though the wheels were first seen on the earth, they often were lifted up above it: all which might signify, that the dispensations of God on earth are connected with heavenly things, and are all appointed in subordination to the concerns of his Church. The firmament, over the heads of the living creatures, was as the colour of the terrible crystal, (or, as some render the word, ice;) at once clear, splendid, and magnificent; and suited to impress the mind with solemn awe and terror. This might also denote that the ministry of the angels was entirely subordinate, and infinitely inferior, to the majesty and power of God. Whilst under this firmament the living creatures executed their commissions, the noise of their motion resembled that of the rushing of mighty waters, or of tremendous thunders, (called here the voice of the Almighty,) or of the shout of an army; which may give us an idea of the number and power of these ministering spirits. But when they had executed their commissions, and let down their wings, a voice was heard from the firmament; perhaps denoting the divine approbation of their services, or the communication of further orders.

V. 26—28. The emblems of the attendants and providential appointments of Israel's God having been shown, some glimpses of his divine glory are here given: but they are even more abstruse than what hath been already considered. Probably the Lord intentionally left these emblematic or hieroglyphical discoveries of himself and his works so obscure and intricate, in order that whilst they suggested the intended instruction, they might not be capable of being delineated by the painter, or tempt the statuary to form a similitude of them, (though some have absurdly tried to do it.) There appeared to the prophet, (not a real throne, but) "the likeness of a throne;" an emblem of the sovereign authority of JEHOVAH over all creatures, over both the world and the Church: and it was as the appearance of a sapphire-stone: that is, it was exquisite in beauty and splendour. Upon this likeness of a throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man, or Adam; which evidently denoted the eternal Son, the second person in the sacred Trinity, who afterwards assumed human nature, "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven," who before in the form of God was Israel's king. The appearance of amber and of fire round about the throne, and within it, and in every part of his manifested presence, being connected with the rain-bow, (a well-known emblem of the covenant of grace,) represented his mercy and covenanted love to his people, as harmonizing with his awful justice and holiness; and showed that he administered all the affairs of his kingdom with reference to his new covenant. 'We may certainly conclude, that this was the appearance of the second person in the blessed Trinity; — because he appears under the resemblance of a man.' — 'The light reflected from this vision had the appearance of a rain-bow, a token of God's covenant of mercy; to denote that God, in the midst of judgment, would remember mercy. Especially this vision, being an evident representation of the Word that was to be made flesh, whose incarnation is the foundation of God's covenant of mercy with mankind, a rain-bow, the symbol and token of mercy, was a very fit attendant.' (Louth.) When the prophet saw this likeness of the glory of the Lord, he fell prostrate before it in adoration, and humble consciousness of his unworthiness. The whole of this introductory vision, when reported to the people, was suited to impress their minds also with solemn awe and fear of the divine displeasure; and yet to raise their expectations of blessings from their glorious Lord and King. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

When the ministers and ordinances of God have been despised and abused, he will sometimes render them precious by scarcity: but he will never leave his people entirely destitute of instruction or encouragement. They are as dear to him in captivity, in poverty, and under severe oppression, as when more prosperous. Outward circumstances cannot preclude them from his gracious manifestations: and his providence and grace will concur in qualifying them for the services for which they are intended, and in calling them forth to them. We are reminded of the incomprehensible majesty of JEHOVAH and of his infinite perfections, in all the discoveries that he hath made of himself. The humble and attentive believer may understand enough, to impress his mind with solemn awe, and to inspire filial confidence: but he must perceive such depths in every subject relative to the divine Being and perfections, as serve to teach him humility and adoration. Thus we may learn profitable lessons even from those representations which we cannot fully understand: for we may be reminded, that clouds and darkness are round about our God; whilst judgment and justice are the basis of his throne. "A consuming fire goeth before him, and it is very tempestuous round about him," not only when he speaks from mount Sinai, but even when he shows his glory from mount Zion, as the God and Father of his people. Light enough is afforded us to discover, that he doeth all in wisdom, truth, justice, and goodness: but who can declare the depths of his counsels and operations? Let us then attend to those things, which relate to our peace and duty; and leave secret things to the Lord, to whom alone they belong. By faith we may behold him surrounded with an innumerable company of angels, who excel in wisdom and strength, and in all created and communicable perfections: and whilst we contemplate the discoveries of their character and services, we should pray to be made like them here, as we hope hereafter to be equal to them. We should study and copy the wisdom, zeal, alacrity, and diligence, by which they are constantly actuated and directed: and though we cannot reach the exalted strains of their worship, or the perfection of their services; though we have not their wings, but are clogged by these vile bodies, and unable to mount with their rapid flight, or obey with their celerity; yet we may labour with patience and constancy; we may fill up our stations with intelligence and skill; we may go about our work with boldness, and not fear the frown or wrath of man; we may set our affections on heavenly things, and cultivate harmony and love with our brethren and fellow servants; we may go straight forward, undiverted from our path by the smiles or frowns of the world; we may be clothed with humility, and serve the Lord with gladness; we may exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man; and simply give up ourselves to be disposed of, employed, and guided by his Spirit, according to his revealed will, without preferring our own inclinations, secular interests, or honour, to his glory. These things, by the grace of God, may be attained in some good measure here on earth: and then a blessed change may be expected; when sin shall be done away for ever, when our bodies will be made spiritual, and we may emulate with success the worship and services of these blessed spirits before the throne, who run and return like a flash of lightning. At present we should consider them as the ministers of providence, both in justice and mercy; especially as sent forth to minister unto the heirs of salvation, who owe numberless deliverances to their condescending and watchful care. Whilst this should instruct us to imitate their conduct, in our attention to our poor and afflicted brethren, it should endear them to us, though unseen, and make us long for that time when we shall join their blissful society.

While we aim to know and fill up our proper place in the church and in the world; and to serve our generation with cheerful diligence; let us be satisfied with being informed in general, that the Lord guides the wheels of providence as well as of nature: amidst all the apparent intricacies and unnumbered vicissitudes, the whole is directed with an unerring hand: and whether at the top, or at the bottom of the wheel, our place is assigned by him: and for our good, if we be indeed his people. Nor need we despond in the lowest scenes of adversity; for the wheels keep turning round, and will raise us again in due time from our depression: whilst they, who presume upon prosperity, know not how soon they may be cast down. The dispensations of Providence are ordered under the influence of that Spirit, which sanctifies the Church and dwells in the heart of every believer: if then the vast designs of omnipotent wisdom dismay and perplex us; if the view of the Lord's awful power and justice alarm us; let us look to Him, who filleth the mediatorial throne, and ruleth over all worlds, and who shall soon appear on the judgment-seat. And, considering that he dwells in our nature, and is our Brother and our Friend; and that he administers all things in subserviency to that everlasting covenant, the blessings of which he purchased with his blood; we may resume our confidence, and possess a cheerful hope tempering our reverence and godly fear. That covenant is ordered in all things and sure, and, like its great Surety, is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" and though the voice of the Almighty be in itself terrible to us sinful creatures; yet it is most encouraging from the gracious lips of his well-beloved Son. The light of the glory of our God is here more distinctly viewed, as it appears in softened lustre: here we see a just God and a Saviour; a consuming fire to obstinate transgressors, but a most faithful Friend to all who flee to him for refuge. Let sinners then throng to and prostrate themselves before him on his throne of grace, encouraged by his love, while awed by his majesty, justice, and power: and then they will not tremble when he shall appear on his great tribunal. And let believers more and more contemplate his glory, that they may be gradually changed into his image, by the Spirit of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Daniel is once called "son of man." (Dan. viii. 17.) but Ezekiel is the only prophet that is generally thus addressed. He had been admitted, as it were, to the society of the spirits before the throne: but this must not cause him to forget, that he was a son of man, a child of Adam, a sinful, frail, and dying creature; though the Lord was pleased to send him to his people, rather than any of the holy angels that ministered before him. As Christ commonly called himself, and was often called by others, "The Son of Man," the title may also be considered as an honourable distinction. It was indeed the Redeemer's lowest style, as he is also "the Son of God;" yet it was a peculiar honour to him to be the chief of all the sons of Adam, and the only one who was free from sin, and well pleasing to God on his own account. And, though this was not the case with Ezekiel, yet he was highly favoured, in being admitted to these visions of God, and employed in the prophetic office, while the nation and the priestly family were in so great affliction and disgrace. When he lay prostrate in an adoring posture upon the earth, he was not so well prepared to receive and execute the divine mandates: and therefore he was ordered to arise and stand on his feet; and the Spirit of prophecy, communicated to him, encouraged and enabled him so to do.

14 For ^f they are * impudent children, and stiff-hearted: I do send thee unto them, and thou shalt say unto them, ^g Thus saith the Lord God.

15 And they, ^h whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, (for they are a rebellious house,) ⁱ yet shall know that there hath been a prophet among them.

16 And thou, son of man, ^k be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though ^l briers and thorns be with thee, and thou dost dwell among scorpions: be not afraid of their words, nor be dismayed at their looks,

1 On, rebell; — 1 Luke x 19. Rev ix 3-6.

V. 3-5. The Lord, appearing in vision in the likeness of a man, (i. 26.) commissioned the prophet to go in his name to the house of Israel. His personal ministry was confined to the captives in Chaldea: but the Jews in their own land and the dispersed Israelites were included in his commission; many of his predictions and reproofs related to them, and his writings would reach them: and though he delivered prophecies concerning other nations, yet they all had reference to the nations of Israel and Judah; (the original is rebellious nations.) For thus God described them; as from generation to generation they had continued to rebel against him, and were still disposed to do the same. They were a shameless, daring, and hardened race of obstinate transgressors: * impudent in their countenances and hardened in their hearts: ⁱ yet they must not be wholly given up, being favoured for their fathers' sake, and because of the Messiah that was to be raised up among them. A few might be better disposed; others especially of the rising generation might be reclaimed, and the rest would be left without excuse. The prophet was therefore to go to them, and to preface his message, with, "Thus saith the Lord God." And whether they would or would not regard his message; (for they were so rebellious, that he might expect many of them to treat it with contempt;) yet they would know by the event, that a prophet had been sent to them: for his predictions would assuredly be verified.

V. 6. The prophet was here warned to arm himself with courage and patience: for he must expect ill treatment from the rebels, if he faithfully stood up for the authority, law, truth, and glory of God. They were in themselves as worthless and noxious as thorns and briers; yea, as venomous and malignant as scorpions: and their company would be as uneasy to him as the thorns and briers, which tear the flesh of those who fall down among them, or endeavour to pass through them: nay, they would attempt to destroy him as scorpions. And even their menacing words and looks would intimidate and silence him, except he were upheld by faith and the fear of God.—ⁱ The prophets and messengers of God are often exhorted to take courage, without fearing any man's person, or standing in awe of any man's greatness. Such a presence though they be a rebellious house.

7 And ^a thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear; for they are [†] most rebellious.

8 But thou, son of man, hear what I say unto thee; ^b Be not thou rebellious like that rebellious house; ^c open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee.

9 And when I looked, behold, ^d a hand was sent unto me; and lo, ^e a roll of a book was therein;

10 And he ^f spread it before me: and it was written within and without: and there was written therein ^l lamentations, and mourning, and woe.

of mind is expressed by ααζηνρία (boldness)—in the New Testament. And they have need of great presence of mind, who are to reprove men hardened in sin, who are always impatient of reproof, and become enemies of those, who tell them such truths as they have no mind to hear. (Lowth.)

V. 8. The prophet would be especially tempted to decline his work, or to slun to declare the whole counsel of God, before such obstinate rebels and furious opposers. Probably, at this very time he was unwilling to undertake a service which appeared so perilous and discouraging. But the Lord showed him, that his refusal or unfaithfulness would rank him also among the rebels, and warned him not to imitate their vile conduct. He was therefore ordered to open his mouth, and eat the roll which would be given him: that is, he must receive, study, and digest it in his mind; that he might be prepared to speak the contents of it to the people, without fear or hesitation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. Whilst these words were speaking, the prophet saw a hand sent unto him, which had in it a roll of parchment, or of such other materials as were then used to write upon. This roll being opened before him, he saw it every where written with "Lamentations, and mourning, and wo." This showed the heavy judgments, that he would have to denounce against his rebellious people; the performance of which would cause them to lament and mourn, and would render them most miserable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should attend to the word of God, with a disposition to yield a prompt obedience to it. When he calls upon the sinner to awake, arise, and attend to the concerns of his soul, to repent and be converted, and believe the Gospel; the Spirit of life and grace accompanies the call, and as it were sets him on his feet, and enables him to do what indeed before was his duty, but which he had neither will nor power to perform. The same blessed influence must be depended on by ministers and Christians, in every service to which they are called. Human depravity never appears so great, as in the impudent, daring, obstinate, and atrocious wickedness of those, who have been most favoured with the means of grace. Yet the Lord will not forsake his Church, though multitudes of such base characters have in every age infested it. He knows how to discriminate between the precious and the vile, and to estimate the degree of men's rebellion: and he often sends his ministers to those whom he foresees will not regard their word. But whilst they rebuke and warn with all authority in his name, he will be glorified and they will be accepted, whether men will hear or whether they will forbear: and they, who have most despised the word of God when faithfully preached, will know, when condemned for neglecting so great salvation, that a prophet hath been among them. The more outrageous and insolent sinners are in wickedness, the more bold and faithful must ministers be in addressing them: they cannot please men and serve Christ; they must be armed with that mind which was in him, that they may be prepared to endure hardship and to bear the cross: they must expect to be harassed by bribes and thorns, if not to dwell with scorpions; and it would be vain to look for ease, comfort, or safety, in such a situation, except from the Lord. They must not then fear the proud looks or blustering words, the mockings, revilings, or menaces, of powerful rebels: but must trust in God's protection, speak his words, and fear nothing but being numbered by him among the rebellious, or being seduced or terrified to copy, or countenance their ungodliness: and they must diligently hear the words of God, and meditate on them continually, that they may be earnest in their work and well qualified for it. They who are most acquainted with the Scripture will most clearly perceive, that it is every where filled with lamentations, mourning, and wo to impenitent sinners, whether infidels, profligates, pharisees, or hypocrites; and that all the grace and precious promises of the Gospel will eventually be confined to the penitent, believing, and obedient servants of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. The Lord Christ, the eternal Word, from his throne, here continued to speak to his prophet. He ordered him to eat what he found; that is, to receive into his mind and heart the revelations made to him, without objecting to any part of them. He was to receive the truths of God as the food of his soul, and to feed upon them by faith, and with a spiritual relish; and whatever he thus found would prove wholesome and nourishment. When he had eaten the roll of the book, he was ordered to go and speak to the house of Israel. Accordingly he opened his mouth, and the Lord fed him with the roll; as an emblem, that he communicates his truth to all whose hearts are prepared to receive it. He must also meditate on every part of this roll, that his judgment might be formed on it, his memory stored with it, and his affections regulated by it; as the stomach digests, and the bowels assimilate the food for the nourishment of our bodies. Accordingly he did so; and the roll, though written within and without with lamentations, and mourning, and wo, was in his mouth as honey for sweetness. The revelation of future events, and the meditation on the truths of God's word, were very pleasant; and perhaps the first thoughts of being honoured as a prophet were agreeable: but when he afterwards considered what predictions and denunciations he was to deliver to the people; that these would increase their condemnation; and that he would be hated and persecuted on this account, his spirit was much embittered. V. 4-11. The prophet seems to have been very reluctant to his work; and therefore he was repeatedly urged to it. He was not sent, (as Jonah had been,) to Nineveh, or to any of the surrounding nations, whose language, not being understood by him, would have appeared strange and uncouth, nor could he have spoken to them but by an interpreter: but he was sent to his own people, even the nation of Israel. Yet had he gone to any of the nations who were strangers to the language and religion of Israel, they would have been better disposed to attend to him: their hearts were not so hard, nor their consciences so seared, as those of Israel were become, by continually sinning against convictions and abusing their peculiar advantages; and therefore they would have been more susceptible of terror or shame. But the Israelites would not hearken to the prophet, for they would not hearken to the Lord himself; being almost universally impudent and hardened in their impiety. At the same time that God informed Ezekiel of the ill success of his ministry, he assured him that he had prepared, or would qualify, him to encounter opposition, by giving him abundant intrepidity and firmness: so that with dauntless courage he should be enabled to oppose and reprove their sins; inasmuch that their frowns and menaces should make no more impression on him, than on an adamant, which is harder than a flint. (Marg. Ref.) And therefore, depending on this promise of support in the hour of trial, he ought to dismiss his present fears: and having heard and well understood all the words that God sent him to speak, he should go immediately to his captive brethren, and declare them with all plainness and authority. 'He showeth, (10.) what is meant by eating the book; which is, that the ministers of God may speak nothing of themselves, but that only which they have received of the Lord.'

V. 12-15. As the prophet seems still to have shown a reluctancy to his work, he was supernaturally apprehended by the Spirit of prophecy, and conveyed to the persons to whom he was to deliver his message; (Marg. Ref.) and the vision still continuing, he heard, as he was departing, the voice of a great rushing. This some suppose to have been an emblem of the great commotions which he was about to predict. It, however, proceeded from the living creatures, the hosts of angels; who at the same time "blessed the glory of the Lord from his place;" or adored the displays of his glory, in all these dispensations and appointments. 'The words imply, that though God should forsake his temple (ix. 3.) and destroy the place that is called by his name; yet his presence will make a temple of every place, and multitudes of the heavenly host will always be ready to do him service.' (Louth.)—The noise of the wings of the living creatures, which touched each other, and the noise of the wheels, intimated that the unanimous ministrations of angels and the dispensations of Providence would concur with the predictions of the prophet. Thus he was lifted up and taken away: but he went in great bitterness and heat of his spirit. The joy which he first experienced, in receiving the divine message, was quickly turned into anguish and dismay, at the prospect of those calamities which were coming on his people; and probably because of the opposition which he had to encounter. But he was unable to withstand the divine power which constrained him to proceed. Then he came to the captives at Tel-abib, &c. 'These seem to have been a distinct colony—from those that are mentioned i. 3.' (Louth.) Here he continued seven days among the captives, without delivering his message, either making observations on their conduct, or as some think, waiting for the sabbath, as the best time to speak to them. But he was filled with terror and astonishment at what he had seen and heard. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17-19. (Marg. Ref.) For the admonition, as well as instruction, of the prophet; that he might understand the nature of his office, and the indispensable necessity of faithfully performing it; the Lord expressly declared that he had appointed him a watchman to the house of Israel. The watchmen were stationed to keep a constant look out, that they might discern the enemy or danger at a distance, and warn the people to avoid or repel them; but if they neglected to watch or to give warning, they would be chargeable with the murder of such as perished through their negligence. In like manner, a centinel in the army, though often exposed to danger from the enemy, is in greater danger from his commander, if he desert his post or not attend to his duty. But if the watchman gave notice of the approaching danger, and the people neglected to profit by the warning, they might indeed be cut off, but he would be guiltless. Thus the Lord had appointed the prophet to observe, and to report to his people, the dangers to which their sins exposed them: this he was required to do, by hearing the word of the Lord, and warning them from him. And if he did not fairly report to the wicked the sentence of death and destruction, which the Lord had passed upon them, warning them to repent and turn from their wicked ways, that they might save their lives; they would then be cut off by divine judgments in their sins, and the prophet would be condemned as their murderer. But if he gave the wicked fair warning, and they still went on in their sins, and perished, he would be free from guilt, and not be considered as necessary to their ruin. So that there were sufficient reasons why he should be very faithful, though exposed to much contempt and persecution, and apparently unsuccessful; as this would be the only way, in which he could avoid being involved in the guilt and ruin of his people. 'The wicked man shall die in a state of sin, and be condemned to those punishments, to which death translates sinners. (John viii. 24.) Thou shalt be justly accountable for the loss of his soul, just as a man's blood is laid to the charge of him, that is any way necessary to his death.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20, 21. 'If he, that hath been instructed in the right way, turn back.' 'His righteous deeds seemed to be done in faith, and were not.' (Marg. Ref.) 'When a man who carries himself as righteous, and is in his whole course inoffensive, doth turn away from that his holy profession, and give himself over to a trade of wickedness, and I meet with him in that sinful course, and surprise him with my judgments, he shall die, &c.— Those good actions, which he had formerly done, and his foremost holy carriage, shall not be so respected as to keep him from just condemnation.' (Bp. Hall.) If one of the few righteous should turn aside from his religion and righteousness, to the commission of iniquity; if the heart-searching God should be pleased to lead him into such circumstances as tended to make trial of him, and to call forth his concealed lusts, and thus to prove a stumbling block in his way; and if the prophet should neglect to warn him of his danger, and through his neglect the man should fall and perish in his sins, notwithstanding all the righteousness that he had done, (which could not atone for his sins, and indeed could only be external;) in that case the prophet would be condemned as necessary to his destruction. But if he faithfully warned the righteous, and put them upon their guard against apostacy and iniquity, the Lord would bless his warnings, to preserve them from sin, and to promote their salvation; and the prophet would also be accepted, and be pure from the blood even of such as perished notwithstanding. The Scriptures speak of persons and characters, as they appear to men. Many, who have been thought true believers, have apostatized and died in sin, as far as man can see: and if indeed a real Christian should thus apostatize and die impenitent, his righteousness would not be remembered, and he would perish in his sins. But the security of the covenant of grace is this, 'God will put his fear into the hearts of his people, that they shall not thus depart from him.' And the holy Scriptures are every where written in a popular style: and not with that studied regard to exact consistency, which appears in the works of very systematical divines.

V. 22-27. The prophet, being powerfully impelled to follow the divine direction, was led forth into the plain, that the Lord might further commune with him. There he had the same vision of the glory of God, with the same effects, as before. And he was ordered to go and shut himself up in his house; there to wait for more particular instructions, in solitude, prayer, and meditation. He was also informed, that they would put bands upon him; either his friends, as supposing him beside himself, or his enemies, as enraged by his predictions. Some, however, explain this of the transactions recorded in the next chapter.—His confinement and bands were emblems of the Jews, when shut up in Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; and of their bondage after the city was taken. Thus he was prevented from going among the people: nay, the Lord declared that he would cause him to be dumb, that he might not be a reprover to them, because of their rebellion. Probably these restraints were meant as a rebuke to the prophet, for his unbelieving fears and reluctance to his work; and to teach him submission to the divine will: but they were also intended to correct or punish the people, who were not disposed to welcome a faithful reprover; and probably they had shown some tokens of contempt and enmity, whilst he sat amongst them at Tel-abib. However, the prophet would not always continue thus silent: but it was not intended that he should speak when he pleased, or when the people required him; but when the Lord spake to him. Then he would open his mouth, and enable him to deliver his message with boldness and authority; and placing life and death, the blessing and the curse, before the people, to leave them to their choice, and the effects of it, whether they would hear or forbear.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15.

We should readily receive the whole word of God; for every part of it is salutary and beneficial. Its doctrines, promises, precepts, warnings, examples, and denunciations, may all be turned into wholesome nourishment by faith and prayer; nay, the believer may deduce sweetness and comfort from those passages, which speak terror to the ungodly, whilst he thinks of Him, who hath "delivered him from the wrath to come." The word of Christ should therefore dwell richly in us; but especially in those, who are to speak it to others; for if they are not well acquainted with it, and experienced in it, they will not be able rightly to divide it, and apply it to their hearers. The Lord is always ready to communicate divine instruction to those, whose minds are open to receive it: and to assist their endeavours to understand the Scriptures. But, however sweet retirement, meditation, and communion with God may be, yet we must prepare also for active service. We may say upon the mount, it is good to be here: but we must descend to struggle with temptations, to endure hardships, to face opposition, to bear our cross, and to follow our suffering Lord. The work of the ministry generally appears very pleasant in the prospect, and whilst pious men are studying and preparing for it; and doubtless it is a good and most desirable work: yet they, who mean as ministers to be valiant for the truth in this rebellious world, must prepare for severe trials and conflicts. However, we need not hesitate to speak the words of God unto the people: for if we act by his commission, and according to his instructions, we may be sure that he will bear us out. But faithful ministers will often meet with more difficulties among false brethren, than among profligates: and they, who are sent to poor Indians and Pagans, have frequently found them more open to instruction and conviction, than men in Christian countries. So that their hard language, not to be understood without an interpreter, has not so much impeded their success, as the daring and hardened impiety of persons brought up under the sound of the Gospel, would have done. When sinners are very bold in the service of Satan, we should not be cowardly in the cause of God: when impiety and infidelity wax insolent and impudent, we should grow more strenuous and zealous in opposing them: and if our enemies set their faces as a flint, and make their brow as brass; the Lord can make ours as the adamant, and enable us to withstand deceivers and opposers to the face, without fearing their frowns, threatenings, or rage. But we should remember, that his promises are intended to encourage us to attend on our duty. Having therefore such assurances of strength and support in the hour of trial, we can have no just cause to fear any enemy: and if we receive in our hearts, as well as hear with our ears, all the words of God; and then speak to the people, as we have opportunity, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, it should not greatly disquiet us, if they, who despise the commandments of God, will not hearken to our words. But though these things be our evident duty; and though there be a disposition to attend to them; yet nature will object to, and struggle against, such difficult and perilous services. And though the Spirit of God powerfully operate on our fears, affections, and consciences, and we cannot but go whither he sends us, and speak what he bids us, yet we may often feel great impatience and uneasiness, and go in the bitterness and heat of our spirit. So that, whilst angels are adoring the condescension of our God, in employing such sinful worms in his honourable work, and blessing him for the displays of his glory in his gracious dealings with us; and all are unanimously concurring in the execution of his purposes; we poor sinners, though especially favoured and honoured, may be discontented and repining at the services allotted us! Indeed, it must be allowed to be very discouraging, when we are sent where there is little hope of being useful: and, especially, when the more our hearers are observed, the more desperate their wickedness appears to be. It may also astonish and almost stupify any con-

CHAP. IV.

The prophet is directed to portray Jerusalem on a tile; and by an iron pan, and lying on his side before it for a number of days, to represent the siege and taking of that city, 1—8: and to represent the famine, to which the inhabitants of Jerusalem and the captives would be reduced, by his own coarse, scanty, and ill-dressed diet during those days, 9—17.

siderate man, to compare the awful denunciations of God's word with the lives of most who profess to believe it. We must not, however, spend much time, in associating with sinners, merely to make our observations; except in order to discover the best time and manner of addressing them: and even here timidity and carnal prudence will be apt to insinuate, and dispose us to conceal or soften our message. Yet if the Lord indeed intend us to preach his word, he will renew his calls, and constrain our obedience, by his strong hand upon us.

V. 16—27.

What an awful, important, and arduous work, is the ministry of the Gospel? If we are unfaithful, we expose ourselves to the severest indignation of God, and become guilty of the murder of the souls which perish by our default: and if we are faithful, we must expect to excite the indignation of all who do not profit by our solemn warnings. These considerations should render every one cautious, from what motives, and in what manner, he engages; that he may be sure the Lord hath made him a watchman: they should teach us all to "take heed to ourselves, and to the ministry that we have received of the Lord, that we may fulfil it;" and to guard against ambition, avarice, and every thing that may tempt us to unfaithfulness: they should excite us to continual prayer for the increase of faith, spiritual knowledge, and that sufficiency which the Lord alone can bestow; and to keep before our minds the awful account that must be rendered, if sinners perish by our fault; that "the fear of him who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell," may subordinate all our fears of those "who can only kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do." We cannot indeed prevail with men to attend to the truths and will of God: but we may hear his word, and declare it unto them, showing them plainly both their danger and their remedy: and if we do this fully and faithfully, we shall deliver our own souls, even though they perish in their sins. We should also remember, that we are required, not only to encourage and comfort those who appear to us to be righteous: they too must be warned; for it is by such warnings, that the Lord puts the upright upon their guard, and thus they are preserved from sin unto salvation; and the minister is also exempted from guilt, as to those who deceive themselves, or turn back and perish in their evil ways. For many, of whom men have been

THOU also, son of man, ^a take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and pourtray upon it the city, ^b even Jerusalem: 2 And ^c lay siege against it, and build a fort against it, and cast a mount against it: set the camp also against it, and set ^d * battering rams against it round about. 3 Moreover, take thou unto thee † an iron pan, and set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city: and set thy face against it, and it shall be besieged, and most confident, have grown high-minded and secure; have met with stumbling-blocks in their way, and have fallen and died in their iniquity. So that nothing, except actual perseverance, absolutely evinces the reality of grace and soundness of heart: and the unfaithful preacher, who does not warn men of these dangers, becomes guilty of their ruin, and their blood will be required at his hands. Surely then we should study to be very explicit and particular in our ministry: and seek to profit, rather than to please or be commended by, our hearers! And surely the hearers of the Gospel should not expect from those who watch for their souls, and have such an account to give of their ministry, smooth and soothing discourses; but very alarming and distinguishing warnings, exhortations, and reproofs. Gentleness and caution are not the most requisite qualifications for a watchman, when the house is on fire, or the assassin is about to murder those who are asleep. They do not accuse him of impertinence or rudeness, if he awake them even with noise and violence: but in such a case prefer earnestness to courtesy: and should they not judge in like manner, when their souls are in danger? And ought not the feelings of the minister, who fears lest the blood of the people should be required at his hands, be consulted, as well as those of the auditors, who cannot endure to hear of the terror of the Lord?—But even where the minister does not allowedly temporize, but is obedient in many things to the word of God, he may in others expose himself to rebuke and chastisement, by timidity and procrastination: and the Lord sometimes lays aside for a season such as have sinfully declined opportunities of usefulness. Where, however, the heart is upright, they will profit even by such rebukes and suspensions. The Lord's condescension in showing us his glory, and communing with us sinful worms, notwithstanding our peevishness, is very wonderful: but he will convince us of our insufficiency for any good thing, if he intend to use us as his instruments.—Meditation, study, and prayer, are proper preparations for service: yet, after all, we should be dumb, when called to speak in the Lord's name, if he did not open our mouths, give us our message, and supply us with utterance and boldness. By painful experiences his servants are taught humble submission, and dependence on him: and if they adhere to their instructions, they will be a sweet savour unto God, both in those who hear, and in those who rebelliously reject or abuse their word; and whoever attempts to silence them, takes the readiest way of bringing the heaviest judgments on himself, and on the community to which he belongs.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The captives in Chaldea, as well as the Jews in their own land, vainly hoped that Jerusalem would be preserved, and that they should be delivered from the power of the king of Babylon: but Ezekiel by this sign was ordered to show them the contrary. It is probable that this occurred, whilst he was shut up in his own house, and unable to speak to the people: for by signs he might instruct such as came to him; and when his extraordinary conduct came to be known, many would go to see him from different motives. Thus the affair would become generally known amongst the captives; and in due time be published and explained to the whole nation. It seems to have been a real transaction, and not a vision: and all objections to this construction, taken from the uneasiness of the prophet in the situation here described, arise from forgetfulness of the power of God, who can render his servants easy in any situation.—He was ordered to draw a picture of Jerusalem on a tile, (an emblem of the meanness to which sin had reduced that holy city, and the speedy destruction that awaited it;) that so by a general likeness every spectator might know what city was intended. He was then directed to place around it the similitude of those engines and works, that were used in sieges; and to take an iron pan, or a circular piece of iron, to place round the city as a wall; denoting the fortifications of Jerusalem, and the obstinate defence that would be made by its inhabitants. He himself represented the besiegers, by setting his face against the picture of the city. For three hundred and ninety days he was ordered to lie on his left side: these days denoted so many years: and may be calculated from the establishment of idolatry by Jeroboam in the kingdom of Israel, to the final desolations of the whole land by Nebuzaradan, in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, which the best chronologers compute to have been exactly three hundred and ninety years. (Jer. lii. 30.) In the siege of Jerusalem, and the ruin of the nation, they bore the punishment of their iniquity committed during those years; and Ezekiel, by lying so long on his left side, as a sign to them, typically bore it for them. When he had accomplished those days, he was ordered to lie forty more on his right side: which represented the forty years, that intervened betwixt Josiah's reformation and the same final desolations of the land, and were the more immediate cause of that catastrophe.—Some think that these four hundred and thirty days relate also to the days of the siege, deducting some time for the departure of the besiegers, when they went to fight with the Egyptians; but this is uncertain. The prophet was thus required to set himself against Jerusalem, and to make bare, or stretch out, his arm, to represent the force and fury with which the Chaldeans would conduct the siege. By this sign he prophesied against it: and the Lord would lay bands on him; that is, he would powerfully enable, and even constrain, him, to lie quietly in the posture appointed him, till the days were accomplished. (Note, viii. 1.)

17 That they may want bread and water, and be astonied one with another, and consume away for their iniquity.

V. 9--17. The prophet was moreover ordered to represent the famine, that would prevail during the siege and among the captives, by the food which he used whilst thus made a sign to them. His bread, which was his chief or only support, was to be made of different sorts of grain and pulse mixed together, several of which were seldom used for bread, except in times of urgent scarcity. This he was ordered to prepare beforehand for the three hundred and ninety days, during which he lay on his left side; for he might afterwards prepare for the other forty days. Of this coarse and unpalatable bread he was allowed not much more than ten ounces a day, as small a quantity as life could well be supported with; nor was he to drink more than about a pint and half of water a day, without any other liquor. This denoted, that the besieged Jews, and afterwards the captives, would be reduced to very scanty allowance of the coarsest food; and that they would suffer as much by thirst as by famine. This bread was to be eaten as barley-cakes, as ordinary food, dressed in the meanest and hastiest manner: and to show how the Jews would be reduced to feed on such things as at other times they would have nauseated, and that they would be constrained to disregard the distinction betwixt clean and unclean meats, he was ordered to use human dung, as fuel in baking the cakes, and to do it in the sight of the people, that they might know it. The prophet seems not to have objected to any other part of the Lord's injunctions, except this. He did not urge, that the representation of the siege would expose him to contempt; that it would subject him to reproach, thus to appear as the enemy of Jerusalem; that the allotted provisions were so coarse and scanty, that his health would be ruined by living so long on them; or that the posture in which he was to lie would be very painful and distressing. In all these respects he unreservedly acquiesced: but supposing, that by this last appointment he should contract ceremonial defilement, he objected that he had never been used to pollute his soul by eating any thing unclean, from his youth up to that day. (Marg. Ref.) And though his scruple was groundless, yet the Lord condescended to allow him to use cow's dung for fuel, instead of human dung. By the subsequent explication it appears, that though the hardships to be endured by the captives might be included; yet that the famine, which raged in Jerusalem during the siege, was principally intended. Then the Lord would break the staff of bread, which is the chief support of life: and their bread and water being measured to them in very small quantities, they must eat and drink with astonishment, perceiving how fast their scanty stock of provisions wasted, and how soon they were likely to perish miserably by hunger.

ceiving instruction from God, and in promoting his glory, as far as they are capable of it. In various ways he preaches to our senses: his word addresses our ears as the avenues to the heart; the sacramental signs and pledges of spiritual blessings preach to our eyes, that by them we may be instructed and affected. These external representations often appear mean and despicable to the proud, carnal, and ignorant, who look no further than the outward sign: but to the humble, enlightened, and spiritual mind, they are replete with instruction, caution, and encouragement. For such persons will inquire into the meaning of every external observance, especially those which are of divine appointment; and search out their use and intention, that they may profit by them. The Lord often calls his most favoured servants to the sharpest sufferings and the hardest services; which would be very distressing to them, were they not assured of proportionable supports. But no self-denial, labour, scanty unsavoury fare, hard lodging, or uneasy posture, can render those uncomfortable, to whom the Lord manifests his gracious presence, and communicates his abundant consolations. When we consider what severe and long continued self-denial our gracious God of old required of his servants; and recollect that it was their wisdom and happiness as well as duty to render it; we shall be the better reconciled to the exercise of that moderate self-denial to which he calls us; and shall be shamed out of our reluctance to it, and impatience under it.— They who love the souls of men, would be ready to endure any temporal inconvenience or suffering, to bring them to a sense of their guilt and danger, and to take them off from presumptuous confidences: and, as example is more convincing than words, it behooves all, who desire to be useful ministers, to habituate themselves to a holy indifference about worldly pleasures and interests; that they may exemplify the duties which they inculcate, and, by their obedience to apparently hard commands, put those to shame who refuse obedience in the most favourable circumstances. Indeed, when we consider with what evils sin hath filled the earth, we should all prepare for the worst: we know not how soon we may be forced to eat our refuse food by measure, and to drink our short allowance of water with astonishment; and be glad of the meanest sustenance which we now loathe and throw away. But if Jesus have delivered us from the wrath to come, and we have long been habituated to the practice of holiness, we shall more fear sin and pollution, than any external hardship: and whatever troubles we experience, we shall not be left to consume away in our iniquities.— No external profession or privilege can exempt sinners from deserved punishment: the Lord will set his face against hypocrites, as well as infidels and profligates; and his ministers must do the same, however they may be reviled for it. All, who do not repent and believe the Gospel, must at length bear their own iniquity in that place of

CHAP. V.

The prophet is ordered to shave off his hair ; and to divide, burn, cut, and scatter it, as an emblem of the dealings of God with the Jews, 1—4. The sign applied to Jerusalem and its inhabitants ; their enormous crimes exposed, and dreadful judgments denounced, 5—17.

AND thou, son of man, take thee a sharp knife, * take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thine head, and upon thy beard : ^b then take thee balances to weigh, and divide the hair.

2 Thou ^c shalt burn with fire a third part in the midst of ^d the city, ^e when the days of the siege are fulfilled : and thou shalt take a third part and smite about it with a knife : and a third part thou shalt scatter in the wind, and ^f I will draw out a sword after them.

4 Then ^h take of them again, and cast them into the midst of the fire, and burn them in the fire ; for thereof ⁱ shall a fire come forth into all the house of Israel

5 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God : ^k This is Jerusalem : I have set it in the midst of the nations and countries that are round about her.

6 And ^l she hath changed my judgments into wickedness more than the nations, and my statutes more than the countries that are round about her : ^m for they have refused my judgments and my statutes, they have not walked in them

7 Therefore thus saith the Lord God ; Because ye multiplied more than the nations that are round about you, and have not walked in my statutes, neither have kept my judgments, ⁿ neither have done according to the judgments of the nations that are round about you ;

8 Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold I, ^o even I am against thee, and will execute judgments in the midst of thee, ^p in the sight of the nations.

torment, where not so much as a drop of water can be procured to cool the tongue : and they, who are connected with the wicked, often suffer many temporal afflictions in consequence of it. But Christ alone bare our sins, in his own body on the tree : to expiate our guilt, he fasted, thirsted, agonized, and died. They who believe in him, " shall not come into condemnation ; but are passed from death unto life ;" and as he shows such compassion even to their scruples ; they should not attempt to impose on their brethren the most indifferent observances, which are professedly declined from a principle of conscience.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. This command seems to have been given about the same time as the foregoing. The barber's razor was to be used in shaving his head and beard ; the sharp knife or sword, in smiting a division of the hair : or it may be rendered, " take thee a sharp knife, even take " thee a barber's razor ;" the former may be understood of any sort of sharp instrument, the latter describing the kind. Jerusalem had been the head of the nation of Israel, and the most favoured city upon earth : her numerous inhabitants were her ornament and strength, as the hair is the ornament of the head, and the beard is the token of manhood. But the city was to be desolated and levelled with the ground ; as the head is bared when the hair and beard are shaven off. Then her ornament and strength were taken away : and as the shaving of the Nazarite disannulled his vow ; so perhaps this indicated that the token of her consecration to God was destroyed by her sins. This showed the severity of the judgments of God : and the weighing of the hair intimated the strict justice and exact wisdom, in which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were consigned to their several punishments. The third part of the hair, which was burned with fire in the midst of the city, (that is, the picture of the city before mentioned,) at the end of the siege, (or the days which the prophet lay before it.) (Notes, iv.) denoted, that a third part of the Jews, who had taken refuge in Jerusalem, would perish by famine, pestilence, or conflagrations, during the siege, or when it was terminated : the third part, smitten with a knife or sword, represented those who were slain by the besiegers in attempting to escape : and the third part scattered in the wind, represented those who fled, or were carried captives into other countries ; who would be pursued by the justice of God and the cruelty of their enemies, into every place. A few hairs which the prophet bound in his skirts, as if they were to be preserved, of which some were afterwards cast into the fire, signified the remnant, who were left in the land under Gedaliah, and seemed to have acquired a settlement ; till the murder of Gedaliah, and the flight of the rest into Egypt, overturned the whole design. Most of them perished miserably : and the Chaldeans, exasperated by their defection to the Egyptians, seem to have treated the other Jews with greater severity on their account, and to have utterly desolated the land.— Marmonides observes, that the priests were forbidden to shave their heads, in the time of mourning, from whence he concludes that this was performed only in vision. But there is no need of such an evasion to answer the difficulty ; for the immediate command of God to any prophet, is a sufficient discharge from any obligations of the ceremonial law. So Elijah offered sacrifice on mount Carmel, contrary to the rule of the law, (Deut. xii. 5. 1 Kings xviii. 20.) (Lowth.)

9 And I will do in thee that which I have not done, and whereunto I will not do any more the like, because of all thine abominations.

10 Therefore the fathers shall eat the sons in the midst of thee, and the sons shall eat their fathers; and I will execute judgments in thee, and the whole remnant of thee will I scatter into all the winds.

11 Wherefore, as I live, saith the Lord God; Surely, because thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things, and with all thine abominations, therefore will I also diminish thee; neither shall mine eye spare, neither will I have any pity.

12 A third part of thee shall die with the pestilence, and with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee; and a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee; and I will scatter a third part into all the winds; and I will draw out a sword after them.

13 Thus shalt mine anger be accomplished, and I will cause my fury to rest upon them, and I will be comforted: and they shall know that I the Lord have accomplished my fury in them.

14 Moreover I will make thee waste, and a reproach among the nations that are round about thee, in the sight of all that pass by.

15 So it shall be a reproach and a taunt, an instruction, and an astonishment unto the nations that are round about thee, when I shall execute judgments in thee in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes. I the Lord have spoken it.

16 When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine, which shall be for their destruction, and which I will send to destroy you: and I will increase the famine upon you, and will break your staff of bread.

17 So will I send upon you famine, and evil beasts, and they shall bereave thee; and pestilence and blood shall pass through thee; and I will bring the sword upon thee. I the Lord have spoken it.

V. 5-10. The Lord here explained this sign, to be, (that is, to represent,) Jerusalem. He had placed that city in the midst of the most populous and prosperous nations then on earth, as the place of his temple, and the centre of his worship; that his perfections, truths, laws, and ordinances, might be known to others, for the glory of his name. Thus she was as the head among the cities and nations of the earth. 'It was a city set on a hill, on purpose that it might be a pattern of religion and virtue to them.' (Louth.) But the inhabitants of this favoured city had abused the ordinances of God, as the cloak or occasion of their sins: they had changed the glorious object of their worship for the most worthless idols and superstitions; they went further from his statutes, and more multiplied their abominations, than the Gentiles themselves: they were not content with copying the judgments, the rites, customs, or worship, of any one heathen nation: but they collected from them all, and improved upon them all! And as they thus dishonoured God among the heathen, he determined to vindicate his insulted honour in their sight, by executing vengeance upon the Jews with a severity as unexampled as their guilt. Inasmuch, that in the extremity of famine they should eat one another; even parents should eat the flesh of their children, and children of their parents, without any distinction; whilst the wretched remnant of them would be dispersed into every part of the earth. The destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of its inhabitants by the Chaldeans, were primarily intended: and yet the desolations and dispersions afterwards caused by the Romans formed a still more awful accomplishment of the prophecy. (Marg. Ref.)

—Multiplied. Your idols are in greater number, and your superstitions more than among professed idolaters.
—Scatter. This is another judgment threatened against them by Moses, and remarkably fulfilled in their last dispersion, when every part of the world hath some share of them, and yet they live every where like strangers, only upon sufferance. (Louth.)
V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref.)
V. 13. Comforted, &c. Such expressions are used in accommodation to our apprehensions. If a man has been greatly injured and dishonoured, he is comforted when he obtains satisfaction for the injury, and can wipe away the disgrace. The Jews had greatly dishonoured God, and caused the heathen to blaspheme his holy religion; but his judgments executed on them manifested his power, justice, holiness, and truth; stopped the mouths of blasphemers; and reflected honour on his law and worship. Such "vengeance belongeth unto God;" and he was determined not to rest, till he had satisfied his justice, and glorified his name, in their condign punishment; and in this he would take pleasure. For though he delights not in the death of a sinner; yet he delights in acting in a manner worthy of himself, even in taking vengeance on incorrigible rebels. This sentence he had denounced in his zeal for his own glory; and he would accomplish it, in most tremendous vengeance upon the Jews.
V. 14-17. (Marg. Ref.) The event would show,

1 prediction of the destruction of the idols and idolaters of Israel, and that a remnant should be saved, 1—10. The prophet is ordered to use vehement expressions, to show his detestation of the sins, and his sorrow for the calamities, of his people, 11—14.

2 Son of man, set thy face towards the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them,

That God had denounced these tremendous judgments, from a due regard to the honour of his own name, which would also assuredly induce him to accomplish them in the most awful manner.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is so difficult to make men sensible of their guilt and danger, that we should employ for this purpose every expedient, argument, or illustration, that we can devise. The severest vengeance of God is regulated by the most perfect wisdom and justice: every distinction, when abused, increases guilt and condemnation: and to whatever refuge sinners flee, the fire and sword of the Lord's indignation will overtake them. The professors of Christianity are as a city on a hill, in the midst of the nations of the earth; their conduct cannot be hid. If it consist with their holy profession, God will be glorified, his truths and worship recommended, and a blessing through them communicated to mankind. But, alas! too many of them are the vilest of men; they depart from God's judgments and statutes more than the blind Pagans; they turn his grace into licentiousness, and exceed in fraud, oppression, cruelty, impiety, and iniquity, the worst of the idolaters, among whom they disgrace the Christian name. But let such persons read, in the temporal judgments executed on the Jewish nation, the awful sentence which will be denounced against them in the day of wrath, when God shall deal with them according to their abominations. However he may now spare guilty nations or individuals, he will then have no pity on those who have defiled his sanctuary, and disgraced his Gospel, with their detestable things. Nor will he rest or be comforted respecting them, till by their condign punishment he have wiped off the dishonour, which their crimes have cast upon his name and cause; and until he have satisfied his justice, in executing the most dreadful denunciations which he hath spoken in his zeal.

Nor let those churches who have changed, or made of none effect, his judgments and statutes, that they might observe their own traditions, and maintain their detestable idolatries and superstitions, expect to escape the doom of Jerusalem. By sore judgments will the Lord plead against them, and make them a reproach, a taunt, an instruction, and an astonishment: for he hath spoken, and all shall know his truth in the accomplishment of his word. But let us be instructed by such examples and warnings; let us entreat the Lord to glorify himself in our salvation; and let us endeavour to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." Then will he rejoice over us to do us good; all his promises will belong to us, all his perfections be engaged for our salvation; and only with our eyes shall we behold, and see the destruction of the wicked.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 2, 3. The mountains in the land of Israel, or the whole land of promise, had been polluted with the idolatries of the people; the prophet was therefore ordered to look towards them, and address his predictions to them, as if present, and capable of hearing his word: but the hills and valleys, and other parts of the country, were concerned in it. This was a rebuke of the stupidity of the people; and intimated, that the Chaldeans would shortly desolate the whole land of Judah, as the Assyrians had done that of Israel.

V. 4. 'This verse is plainly taken from Lev. xxvi. 30. 'The word Hammim, images, is generally supposed to mean such as were erected to the honour of the sun.' (Louth.) The peculiar; and, as it might previously have been thought, unlikely event, of the Babylonish captivity, in entirely terminating gross idolatries in Canaan, and among such Jews or Israelites as were not incorporated with the Gentiles, is here emphatically predicted.

V. 7. 'The judgments God intended to bring on the Jews, would make the most hardened and stupid sinners sensible, that this was his hand.' (Louth.)

8 Yet ° will I leave a remnant, that ye may have some that shall escape the sword among the nations, when ye shall be scattered through the countries.

9 And they that escape of you shall remember me among the nations, whether they shall be carried captives, because ° I am broken with their whorish heart, which hath departed from me, and with ° their eyes, which go a whoring after their idols : ° and they shall loathe themselves for the evils, which they have committed in all their abominations.

10 And ° they shall know that I am the LORD, and that I have not said in vain that I would do this evil unto them.

V. 8-10. The Lord did not intend that the nation of Israel should be utterly destroyed by these judgments. A small remnant should be reserved in mercy, though all deserved to perish: these should escape the sword that would be drawn out after the captives; and at length be led to remember the Lord, and their obligations to him and rebellion against him. They would then recollect their proneness to idolatry from age to age, by which they had wearied out his patience and goodness; even as a beloved wife breaks the heart of her husband by her continual adulteries, and by showing a disposition to prefer every man she looks on to him. Thus they would learn to abhor themselves, and would become loathsome in their own sight, when they reflected on their own base and ungrateful conduct towards the Lord, who had so greatly favoured them: and they would know his power, truth, and justice, in the execution of the predicted evils upon them; and would confess, that they were not vain words, as they had once thought them, nor pronounced without cause; but that they deserved all that they endured. Then they would fear God, forsake all idolatry, and return to his worship and service.

V. 11. The exceeding wickedness and insensibility of the Jews, and the terrible calamities coming upon them, required that the prophet should express his concern in the most emphatical manner: he was therefore directed, as one carried away with the earnestness and vehemency of his mind, to smite with his hand and to stamp with his foot; whilst he exclaimed against the abominations of the people, and denounced the judgments of God upon them. This might give many of them an occasion to revile or ridicule him, as enraged, or beside himself: but it might also tend to awaken some of them to a serious consideration of the predictions, which he delivered with so much earnestness.

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whatever men idolize or abuse to sin, will tend to their hurt, or be involved in their ruin; and they who hate the knowledge of God, through love of sin, shall be made to know him by experiencing the power of his wrath. The superstitions that many trust to for safety, often prove the immediate cause of their ruin: and it is as awful for a sinner to be cut off in the act of worshipping an image or a creature, as in the practice of the grossest immorality; for the Lord is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another. However poor benighted Pagans may be spared in their idolatries, if the mountains of Israel, the countries favoured with the oracles of God, become the receptacle of such abominations, they may expect his severest vengeance: and it will not be long before idols and idolatry will be as awfully and effectually destroyed out of the Christian Church, as they were from among the Jews. — Men's wickedness springs from forgetfulness of God, and disregard to their relations and obligations to him. Whatever therefore brings them to remember him, and their sins, should be considered as a blessing. True repentance springs from the knowledge of God and of ourselves: this shows the evil and malignity of our transgressions, the depraved propensity of our hearts to depart from him; and the innumerable provocations committed against him, in our thoughts, words, and works, by all our faculties and senses, our bodies and souls. Then we perceive how much we have done to abuse his goodness, weary out his patience, and violate our engagements and obligations to him; our self-justification and self-admiration will be turned into humble confessions of guilt and self-abhorrence before God; and this will lead us to hope only in his mercy, to acknowledge his truth and justice in all our corrections, and to return to his service with uprightness of heart, renouncing all our formerly beloved, but now loathed, idolatries and iniquities. But men are generally far from this penitent frame of mind; they cavil at the threatenings of Scripture as severe or unjust, or they disregard them as vain words: and are secure and confident upon the brink of destruction. It therefore behoves such of us as are called to preach the word of God, to speak and act as men in earnest, who are deeply affected with abhorrence of the sins against which we protest, and with compassion for those against whom we denounce the vengeance of God. This vehemency of language and gesture will excite the disgust, the ridicule, or the rage, of proud and carnal men, and expose us to contempt and calumny: but if we know the worth of souls, and the danger to which unbelievers are exposed, we shall deem every sinner, who takes warning to flee to Jesus for deliverance from the wrath to come, an abundant recompense for the derision and obloquy that we meet with from thousands, who are thronging the broad road to destruction; and who will be soon convinced, that no earnestness could be too great in such a cause.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 2. The abrupt manner, and the many repetitions, of this prophecy, showed that the prophet was greatly affected by the prospect of the calamities that he predicted: as men cry, Fire, fire! Thieves, thieves! when they or others are in imminent danger. The Lord had long spared the people, or only inflicted partial judgments; but the end was now come to their establishment and prosperity; and his vengeance would desolate the four corners of the land, including Israel as well as Judah. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. In the midst, &c. The dire consequences of Israel's abominable idolatries and iniquities would be manifest in those very places where their crimes had been committed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. An only, &c. That evil is come upon thee which alone shall make a dispatch of thee; there will need no other to second it. (Bp. Hall.) Such an evil, as shall comprehend all other calamities in it. (Louth.) An unprecedented evil, of itself sufficient to ruin the nation. (1 Sam. xxvi. 3.) This was come, or near at hand; for the prediction seems to have been delivered about three years before Jerusalem was besieged.

V. 6. (Note, 2.) A destruction, which shall be fatal to a great part of those that go into captivity; as well as to those who are consumed in their own country. (Louth.)

V. 7. The predicted day of vengeance, which watched for the Jews, was at hand: the day dawned, the tokens of approaching ruin were discernible: the report of the Chaldean invasion was no vain rumour; not like the echo or reverberated sound upon the mountains, by which a single voice might be mistaken for the noise of a multitude; for the Chaldean army was indeed upon the march, and would soon arrive and bring destruction with them. The Hebrew word properly signifies such a joyful sound as used to echo from the mountains, by which the tasters of the grapes expressed their satisfaction, at the time of vintage. (Louth.)

V. 10. 11. The rod, or sceptre, of authority among the Jews had budded into pride, ambition, and tyranny, and blossomed into violence and oppression; and these produced such an increase of wickedness, as brought down the judgments of God upon them. Or Nebuchadnezzar, his rod of correction was grown exceedingly in power, pride, violence, and rapacity; and thus was prepared to punish the Jews; and their pride, violence, and iniquity, exposed them to this prosperous scourge of God. So that nothing would remain in Judah, or Jerusalem, of all their multitude and riches; nor any to lament those that were slain or carried captive. The word translated any of theirs, is by some supposed to mean, their boasters, or tumultuous ones.

V. 12, 13. In general men think they have reason to rejoice, if they are able to buy estates; and to lament, if obliged to sell their houses and lands: but this would by no means be the case of the Jews at that time; for the buyer would soon be driven from his purchased possession; and the seller would only part with what must in a very short time have been torn from him. For the wrath of God against the whole multitude would soon desolate the land; and even they that should survive these calamities, would not be able to return to their possessions at the year of Jubilee, being detained captive at Babylon. None of them would return, till the seventy years of the captivity were accomplished; and then many of them would not be able to claim and obtain possession of their inheritances: and in vain did any of them expect deliverance by their power or courage, whilst they hardened themselves in sin.

V. 14. In defiance of these warnings and predictions, the leaders of the Jews caused the trumpet of war to be sounded, to make all ready to withstand the invaders: but they found the people deprived of all courage and resolution; because God in his wrath had intimidated them.

V. 15. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16-19. A small remnant would escape death by the sword, famine, and pestilence; but they would be driven out of the land, and scattered abroad as lost sheep upon the mountains: and there they would mourn for their sins, and the calamities occasioned by them; as doves of the valleys, (or tame doves,) which are driven to the mountains by the birds of prey, and there mourn their separation from their mates, in the most disconsolate manner. Dejection of spirits would enfeeble the hands of this remnant, and render their knees weak as water, or enervate all their attempts to resist or escape their enemies: and they would express their grief and horror of mind, and their confusion and shame, by every customary token. Then would they find the inefficacy of their silver and gold to purchase them bread, to preserve their lives, to give comfort to their desponding hearts, or to deliver them from the wrath of God and the executions of his vengeance: and therefore, though they had before covetously idolized their riches, and the love of them had been the stumbling-block over which they had fallen into manifold impieties and iniquities, which had exposed them to these calamities; yet they would then cast them into the streets, or leave them without concern to be rifled and removed by the victors, and even count them vile and polluted. For they had got them by injustice, hoarded them in avarice, and employed them in luxury, or in supporting idolatry, in making idols and adorning their temples. (Marg. Ref.)— Some few of them shall have the favour of escaping the common calamity, called elsewhere the escaped or the remnant; from whence is derived the phrase, οὐ σωζόμενοι, in the New Testament; such as are, or should be saved. V. 20—22. The temple had been the chief beauty and ornament of Jerusalem. Solomon had builded and decorated it with vast magnificence ; many of his successors had expended large sums in repairing and beautifying it ; God had greatly honoured it, as the place in which he displayed his glory ; and the people were vain of it and confided in it. But, as they had defiled the courts of it, and even the sanctuary itself, by their detestable idols, the Lord determined to remove them far from it into captivity ; or to make it as an unclean thing, being defiled by the presence of the Chaldeans, and by the slaughter there committed. These most wicked and impious strangers would be allowed to rifle its sacred treasures : nay, the Lord would turn away his face, as one who utterly disregarded what was doing, whilst they entered the holy of holies, his secret place, plundered it of the mercy-seat and the ark of the covenant, and utterly profaned and destroyed it. This is the general, and probably the true, interpretation. (Marg. Ref.) but the Septuagint connects the passage with the nineteenth verse, and renders the twentieth as follows. ' They were proud of their chosen ornaments, and made of them the images of their abominations ; therefore I have given them up to be polluted,' &c.

V. 23. This commandment to make a chain implied, that the Jews, as condemned criminals, would be delivered up into the hands of their enemies, and he led away captive and in chains, and cast into prison. " Bloody crimes" were either such as were punishable by the death of the criminals ; or rather those of the oppressors and persecutors, that had filled Jerusalem with innocent blood. The original is, the judgment of bloods ; unjust decisions of the magistrates, by which the innocent were put to death.

V. 24. Pomp of. &c. That is, the magnificence of their greatest and haughtiest princes.

V. 26. When one calamity should succeed to another, and alarming rumours be continually propagated, the people would not be able to obtain information from the prophets ; nor would the priests be able to give them instruction or consolation ; and their elders and counsellors would be confounded and infatuated. This related to the case of the Jews during the invasion of the land, and the siege of the city ; and afterwards during the Babylonish captivity : but it still more emphatically corresponds with the condition of that nation, from the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans to this present day.

V. 27. ' There shall be a general consternation of all ranks and degrees of men. Those in authority shall want presence of mind to give counsel and directions ; and their inferiors shall have no heart to carry them into execution.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

An end will soon come to all the prosperity and enjoyment of impenitent sinners, in every corner of the earth. Now is the day of the Lord's patience and mercy : but the day is at hand, when he will send his anger upon ungodly men, and judge and recompense them according to their ways, without mercy or pity : then they that are filthy will continue filthy still, and their abominations shall be in the midst of them for ever. This destruction is indeed an evil, an only evil, a natural evil, of magnitude proportioned to the moral evil and desert of sin : and all other sufferings may be deemed trivial and scarcely worth notice, when compared with it. We should therefore loudly sound the alarm, and strenuously and earnestly call on men " to flee " from the wrath to come." For this misery continually overtaketh one and another of the ungodly, and it watcheth for every one of them. The morning of our dying day, and of the day of judgment, will soon dawn : the time of the sinner's trouble is at hand ; and they, who have treated all the warnings of God's word and providence as false alarms, will find them awfully realized ; and no more consider them as the sounding of the mountains. What then will they think of their presumptuous delays and carnal security, when the day of life and of grace shall expire ? when the anger of God shall be accomplished on them, when vain mirth, self-flattery, and false hope, shall terminate in weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth ! Indeed, whilst men are indulging their pride and lusts, and these are budding, blossoming, and bringing forth fruit

CHAP. VIII.

The prophet is, in vision, brought to Jerusalem and to the temple, 1—4. He sees the image of Jealousy by the gate of the altar; the elders of Israel worshipping base idols in a secret chamber of the temple; women weeping for Tammuz, and men with their backs to the temple worshipping the sun, 5—16. The Lord appeals to him, whether such abominations do not deserve the severest punishment, 17, 18.

AND it came to pass ^a in the sixth year, in the sixth month, in the unto death, the instruments of vengeance are also preparing: and thus sudden destruction cometh, from which there is no escape. Though we should continue to be favoured with national peace and temporal prosperity, yet how soon will the time arrive, when all our joys and sorrows about worldly gain and loss will be no more! The fashion of this world passeth away, and all our eagerness and anxiety about it are vain and useless. The wrath of God hath filled the earth with trouble and death: men must soon be torn from their possessions, to return no more to them: and how wretched must they be, who have no inheritance in that world, to which we are all hastening, and from which there is no return! nor can any man strengthen himself in iniquity, so as to outbrave these tremendous evils.

V. 16—27.

All efforts to outbrave or elude divine vengeance, in this world or in the next, must be unavailing: the wrath of God dismays the most intrepid; their hands hang down and their knees wax feeble, and inward horror accompanies their outward calamities and confusion. And if, in the siege and taking of cities, men cast away their gold and silver, as an encumbrance rather than a security, what judgment will sinners form of their value, in the final day of wrath and perdition of ugly men? Even here they can neither comfort the wounded heart, nor ease the burdened conscience, nor purchase health and ease; and in some cases they will not even procure food to satisfy the hunger of their famished possessors. Yet, after all that can be said, men will set their hearts on such lying vanities; and multiply crimes, and treasure up wrath, remorse, and horror, in order to increase such riches as will yield no comfort when they most want it, and which must be left for ever! Even in religion human folly and depravity are equally conspicuous: men value themselves on distinctions and forms, which they disgrace by their crimes, and which must finally increase their condemnation! But whatever supposed decency, beauty, or majesty, there may be in our modes of worship, God will deem them polluted to all such as make them the cloak of their iniquities: and he hath often permitted the most impious, rapacious, and cruel, of the nations to plunder and waste those professing churches, which have dishonoured him by their crimes. In vain do they seek peace or deliverance from their enemies, if unrepented sins exclude them from the peace and protection of God. Mischiefs must at length come upon mischief, and rumour upon rumour; whilst neither prophet, priest, counsellor, nor prince can escape, or show others any way of deliverance. For they who will not mourn for sin with godly sorrow, must bewail its effects with bitter lamentations, being covered with confusion and clothed with desolation. To this awful ruin the whole multitude of the human species is exposed; yet "a remnant according to the election of grace" shall escape. These may be known by their mourning for sin, with broken hearts and penitent confessions, like doves of the valleys; and by becoming harmless, pure, gentle, modest, and loving, according to that instructive emblem. Such penitents shall obtain pardon and peace by faith in Jesus Christ, and those riches, which will give comfort in the hour of death, and profit them in the day of wrath. May the Lord incline and enable us to choose and seek this good part, that shall never be taken from us!

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. Only fourteen months, or four hundred and twenty days, seem to have passed from Ezekiel's first vision to the date of this chapter, (i. 2.) which would not allow time for his lying three hundred and ninety days on his left side, and forty on his right side, according to the interpretation given of that transaction, (Notes, iv.) But this might be their leap-year, to which a full month of thirty days was added, as it is well known: or this transaction might take place after the expiration of three hundred and ninety days, and before the forty days were entered on. At the time here mentioned, the prophet was sitting in his house, and was attended by some of the elders of Judah that were in captivity: perhaps it was the sabbath day, and they came to attend his instructions, as they had neither temple nor synagogue to resort to; or they came to consult him about some of their affairs. Whilst they were present, he was seized by a powerful divine impulse, and cast into an ecstasy or trance, and had the following vision presented to his mind.

V. 2—4. (Note, i. 26—28.) Doubtless this was the same appearance that Ezekiel had before: “a likeness,” that is, of a man upon a throne, “as the appearance of fire downwards,” denoting the terrible and righteous indignation of God against the rebellious Jews; and as of brightness and of the colour of amber upward, perhaps implying the essential glory and excellency of the eternal Son of God, as they appear to the inhabitants of heaven.
 This glorious person seemed, in vision, to put forth the form of a hand, and to take hold of a lock of the prophet’s hair; and at the same time the Spirit lifted him up in the vision of God, and conveyed him to Jerusalem, to the entrance of the inner court of the temple from the north, by that gate which was called the altar-gate. There was a seat or niche, prepared for some base idol, perhaps Baal, or Molech, which was called the image of jealousy; because the open worship of this idol provoked the Lord to jealousy; even as the open adultery of a woman, in the house of her husband, would excite his jealousy. At the same time the glory of the Lord, according to what the prophet had formerly seen in the plain, appeared to him; which intimated that JEHOVAH had not yet withdrawn his presence from his temple, though he had been treated with such contempt by the open preference given by the Jews to a base idol. The whole was presented in vision before the prophet’s mind, whilst he continued in his own house: but doubtless it was an exact discovery of the idolatries committed at the temple; and it was intended to show the justice of the predicted vengeance, and to represent the reason and manner of the Lord’s departure from his professed worshippers.

V. 6. That I, &c. The detestable idolatries, committed even at the temple of God, were such as to tempt to leave it and the people to the malignant imaginations of the enemies. He could not consistently with his honour dwell any longer in his polluted sanctuary, or among such vile idolaters. They acted as if they had determined to exclude him from his temple, and drive him from among them: for the injured husband must put his wife away, when her adulteries become notorious and abandoned; or else his own reputation will suffer. But as if this one image, openly worshipped in the court of the temple, had been a small matter; the prophet was ordered to turn his eyes another way, and he would discover still more and greater abominations.

V. 7—12. When the prophet had been conducted to some door of the court of the temple, he found a wall, which seems to have been built in order to conceal the idolatries, secretly practised by the elders in the chambers of the temple, which had been converted into a sort of chapel, for that purpose. But when he had examined this wall, he discovered a hole: and being ordered to dig, or to work at it to make it larger, he found a door that had been walled up; by which he was commanded to enter. There he saw all kinds of reptiles and unclean beasts, such as the Egyptians used to worship; and all the idols, that Israel or Judah had ever worshipped, painted all around upon the wall: and before them seventy men of the elders of Israel, (according to the number of the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation,) were collected together. One of them he knew to be Jaazaniah, (who perhaps was president of the council, or a very eminent man among them,) and there were they, as consecrated priests of this rabble of dunghill-gods, every man with his censor in his hand, lavish by burning incense and presenting their adorations.
 This indeed was shown to the prophet in a vision; but it was the actual conduct of the rulers and elders of the temple, in their dark recesses in the chambers of the 13 ¶ He said also unto me, Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see ^d greater abominations that they do.

14 Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the LORD's house which was ^e toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz.

15 Then said he unto me, ^e Hast thou seen this, O son of man? Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see ^e greater abominations than these.

16 And he brought me into ^b the inner court of the LORD's house, and, behold, ^c at the door of the temple of the LORD, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, ^a with their backs toward the temple of the LORD, and ^a their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east.

temple, which they secretly appropriated to their images; and, as some think, in the private chambers of their own houses also. For they concluded, that the Lord did not see them, and that he had forsaken the earth, or the land. He did not deliver the people out of their difficulties; because they continued in sin, and had not sought him with sincere repentance, faith, and prayer, but merely in hypocrisy: and they concluded that he either could not, or would not, help them; and that they were authorized to seek help from some other quarter, as Saul did, to his own destruction. Nay, they seem to have questioned the existence, or the omnipresence and omniscience, of JEHOVAH: they concluded that no good would come from waiting on him, nor any harm from forsaking him: and they determined to seek help from those idols, whose licentious characters and worship they loved, in proportion as they hated the holy character, worship, and service of God.

V. 14. Weeping, &c. It is not agreed who or what Tammuz was, or on what account this idolatrous ceremony was observed in honour of him. But it is generally allowed, that he was some very profligate man, who was deified after his death; and that this annual lamentation for him was attended with the most infamous licentiousness: and, concerning such an union of impiety and immorality, the less we know the better.

V. 15. Greater, &c. Some learned men observe, that this expression may be rendered "great abominations besides these." And indeed we can scarcely conceive greater abominations, than those before mentioned.

V. 16. These twenty-five men are supposed to have been priests, who turned their backs on the temple of God to worship the rising sun! The Holy of Holies was at the west end of the sanctuary, and that was westward of the altar: so that they could not worship the sun with their faces to the east, without turning their backs on the Lord and his holy place. We cannot doubt but that the practice of turning to the east in some parts of public worship, which is still retained in many Christian Churches, was originally borrowed from idolaters, who worshipped the sun: and though it is possible for us to be superstitiously afraid of superstition, respecting any indifferent posture or ceremony, yet they, who are very tenacious of this custom, would do well to consider its original, in order to abate their excessive attachment to it.

V. 17. They have, &c. The Jews were not only guilty of these idolatries, but also of oppression and injustice equally atrocious. Thus they used every means to provoke the Lord to anger. Whether the expression, "They put the branch to their nose," refers to some idolatrous practice, or to some methods then in use, by which men endeavoured to exasperate others, and to show their contempt and defiance of them, is not certain. The Septuagint renders it, "They are as those that mock me." They add more fuel to my wrath, which will burst out as a flame to consume them; just as if one should lay a heap of dry sticks upon a fire." (Lightfoot in Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The wrath of God, revealed from heaven against sinners, appears rigorous and extreme, in proportion as men are ignorant of his perfections, of the evil of sin, and of the abominations that are every where committed. If it should please God to give any man a very clear view of his glorious majesty and authority, and of the evil that is in every act of rebellion against him; and should at once present before him, in vision, all the abominations that are continually committing in any one city; there can be little doubt but he would be prepared to justify God in the severest vengeance which he could inflict upon it. But though we are not thus acquainted with all the wickedness which is present to his all-seeing eye, yet, if we carefully search the Scriptures, and compare with them all that we can recollect and are conscious of, in our own thoughts, words, and works; if we carefully watch our own hearts and experience; and if we diligently observe the conduct of the world around us, we shall entertain far more affecting views of human depravity, and of the justice of God in his temporal and eternal judgments, than we used to do; we shall learn to drop our objections, silently to submit to his righteousness, and patiently to wait for that day, when he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and show the reasons of all his dispensations: and this will make us thankful, that there is forgiveness with him, and plenteous redemption for hell-deserving sinners. The carelessness with which men provoke God, and prefer every worthless idol and base lust to his favour and service, sufficiently mark the apostacy, rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity of the human heart; but generally the nearer we come to the sanctuary, the viler iniquities we discover, by diligent investigation. It would peculiarly astonish and shock a pious mind, to be shown all the abominations which have been committed by the professed patrons of religion, in every part of the world. The superstition and idolatry, the blasphemous pride and ambition, the fraud and imposture, the avarice, perjury, persecution, cruelty, and licentiousness, by which the Lord hath been provoked to jealousy, as it were, in the inner court of the temple, have in too many instances been notorious to all the world. And thus many churches have provoked the Lord to forsake them, as he repeatedly did his temple at Jerusalem.

V. 7—13.

The abominations, which all men see and cry shame of, are not always the worst, and seldom the whole, that provokes the Lord to jealousy: sometimes still more horrid things are done in secret by those who "love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." Such persons either forget or atheistically deny that the Lord seeth them; and act as if he had forsaken the earth. But he will detect their hypocrisy; and after all their care to conceal their crimes, they commonly leave some opening which leads to a discovery. No superiority in rank, dignity, learning, or worldly wisdom, no sacredness of character and office, will preserve men from the most grovelling lusts, or even from the most stupid idolatries, when they are left to their own deceitful hearts: nay, superior persons are commonly the ringleaders and examples of every abomination to their inferiors, who follow them at an humble distance. They, who grudge all expenses, and are soon wearied out in the spiritual service of God, and who deem themselves degraded by it, often grudge no expense, labour, or debasement, in following their own idolatries and superstitions. For true religion is contrary to their pride and lusts; but their own inventions consist with the indulgence of their several inclinations: and therefore we need not wonder, that they turn their backs on God's service, to keep human traditions, or "turn away their ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables." Thus idolatry and false religion, as well as impiety, connect with violence, oppression, and immorality. Therefore the Lord will deal with them in fury and without pity; and all his judgments on nations and churches are only earnest of his final wrath on the workers of iniquity; when they will indeed cry unto him with a loud voice, but he will not hear them; and when they will plainly appear to have merited their dreadful condemnation. For if some, who make a fair show in the house of God, could be followed to their secret chambers, they would be found committing the most abominable crimes: many, whose exterior is decent, have the chambers of their imagination continually occupied by licentious thoughts, in which they delight, and thus gratify their hateful passions with ideal indulgences: many who have for a time been restrained by natural modesty and regard to character, have afterwards shown their secret inclinations; when, occasion being given them, they have run into the greatest excesses. In short, the more we know of ourselves and of human nature, the more and greater abominations shall we discover: and the longer the enlightened believer, (who is enabled to walk most uprightly before God, and most blamelessly before men,) examines himself and searches his heart, the more will he loathe and humble himself before God; and the more will he value and daily wash in the Fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness. Thus shall he be made whiter than snow: but how will they escape, who live and die neglecting this great salvation?

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. The same person, who before appeared in vision and spake to the prophet, here cried with a loud voice to those that had the charge of the city, to draw near. Accordingly six men came into the city from the north, with each a destroying weapon in his hand. Some understand, by these six persons, the angels, who before had been employed to protect Jerusalem, and were now commissioned to be her destroyers. But as there was no miraculous interposition in these divine judgments, it seems more obvious to consider them as representing the Chaldean army, or its six chief captains, who had a charge or commission against Jerusalem. With them there appeared one clothed with linen, the attire of a priest and not of a soldier, with an inkhorn by his side. Many interpreters explain this to mean Christ, our High Priest and King, who presides over all the desolations on earth, in order to preserve his chosen people ; and who seals them by his Spirit, and writes their names in his book of life. But if this were the Word, and Son of God, what shall we make of the likeness of a man upon the throne, from whence these orders were issued ? It seems therefore more agreeable to the context to suppose that Christ the King of Israel, from the throne, gave these orders ; and that the man with the inkhorn represented an angel, or the angels, that were employed to protect the pious remnant of the Jews from the Chaldeans : and his priestly garment might denote, that their preservation was owing to the priesthood and sacrifice of him that was to come. (Rev. xv. 5, 6.) These persons went into the court of the temple, and stood beside the brazen altar. 'To denote that the men ordained to destruction, were offered up as so many sacrifices, to make atonement to God's justice.' (xxxix. 17. Is. xxix. 2. xxxiv. 6.) (Louth.)

V. 3, 4. The glory of the God of Israel, here mentioned, might either be the visible glory, which appeared in the holy of holies, above the ark, between the cherubim, and which the prophet saw removed from that situation to the entrance of the door of the sanctuary ; or that glory which he had seen in the visions of God, and which represented that token of the Lord's gracious presence with Israel. * The word Cherub stands for Cherubim, as x. 2 — 4. (Louth.) This denoted, that the Lord was about to leave his place, his mercy-seat ; to denounce judgment on the people as from his tribunal, to withdraw from his temple and Jerusalem, and to leave them to the profanations and ravages of their enemies. From this glory the Lord addressed the man who had the inkhorn, and ordered him to go through the city, and to set a mark upon the forehead of every one, who sighed continually, and earnestly protested against the abominable idolatries and iniquities that were there perpetrated. The forehead seems to have been mentioned, as the most conspicuous place in which a mark could be placed : and it might be supposed, that they who deeply lamented the abominations committed in Jerusalem, to the dishonour of God and ruin of religion, either had not committed such crimes, or had repented of them : they were decidedly on the Lord's part ; they would have prevented, by their examples, prayers, and endeavours, the prevalence of wickedness, if they could, and were distressed that they could not. All pious persons at that crisis, no doubt, grieved to see the holy city and temple so horribly polluted. This would therefore take in all who feared God, whatever station they were placed in, or however feeble their gracious dispositions were ; and it would exclude all others. 'When the number of such mourners is not sufficient to divert God's judgments from a nation, they shall at least deliver their own souls.' (Louth.)

He called to the man. 'The second person in the sacred Trinity gave his commands to the angel before mentioned.'

Mark. 'This alludes to the custom of the eastern nations, to mark their servants in the forehead.' (Louth.) A general opinion long prevailed, which the original was thought to favour, that the letter Thau was the mark here intended ; and great disputes have taken place, whether in the Samaritan characters, which are supposed to have been at that time used by the Jews, that letter was, or was not, made in the form of a cross. These disputes, however, only show, how early this use of the form of the cross prevailed in the Christian Church, which made way for the superstition and idolatry of the Papists in this particular. It may be supposed, that the vision in the Revelation made to the apostle John had some reference to this of Ezekiel ; yet no mention is there made of the form of a cross, which would hardly have been omitted, if it had been used on that occasion. (Rev. vii. 2, 3.) Indeed, it is obvious, that in general the less humble believing regard has been paid to the doctrine of the cross, the greater veneration has been rendered to the external form. This began to be introduced, when the simplicity of the Gospel had become greatly corrupted ; it was at its height a short time before the reformation ; and began to decline, when the doctrines of the Gospel became more generally understood and believed.

V. 5-7. The Lord next commissioned the executioners of his vengeance to follow the man with the inkhorn, and to slay, without mercy or distinction, even to utter destruction, all they met with : only they might not come near, (either to hurt or afflict,) any of those who were marked in the forehead. This foretold the merciless carnage, which the Chaldeans would make of the ungodly Jews ; and the gracious protection afforded to the few pious servants of God among them. Thus Jeremiah, Baruch, Ebed-melech, and doubtless others, were preserved. The destroyers were also directed to begin at the sanctuary: and lest they should hesitate to shed blood, and throw the dead carcasses in the courts and sanctuary of God, they were expressly ordered thus to defile them; for this act of signal justice, though a ceremonial defilement, was indeed a moral purification of the temple. Then the prophet saw them begin the slaughter with the elders that were before the house; either the seventy elders whom he had seen burning incense, or the twenty-five men that were worshipping the sun: and then they went forth to make like havoc in the city. The reference of the apostle Peter to this passage seems to intimate, that the second destruction of the city and temple by the Romans was also intended by the Spirit of prophecy. (1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.)

V. 8-11. The prophet, in vision, beholding the havoc made of his people, whilst he was mercifully spared and left alone, as it seems, of all that were in the court of the temple, was greatly affected; and in humble adoration inquired of the Lord, whether he meant to cut off all the residue of Israel, in thus pouring out his wrath upon Jerusalem? The ten tribes were entirely destroyed or dispersed; only a remnant of Judah remained; and they seemed about to be utterly cut off. By this he intended to plead for a mitigation of the sentence, as the honour of God in his promises seemed to be concerned: but the Lord informed him, that the excessive wickedness of both Judah and Israel rendered this severity needful: the land had been filled with murder, as well as with idolatry; Jerusalem was full of obstinate and perverse wickedness, the fruit of the most desperate impiety and infidelity; and therefore the Lord was determined to show no mercy to the nation in general; though he had reserved a small remnant for himself, as the seed of his future Church. In the mean time the man with the inkhorn reported the performance of the divine command: by which it appears, that he presided over and directed those, who executed the vengeance of God on the Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord hath always ready his instruments of judgment as well as of mercy: and when his glory departs from his people, and his power and presence no longer attend his ordinances, the form will seldom continue long, and the signal for his vengeance will commonly be given. But he departs reluctantly and gradually from those who have been long favoured with his presence; and his faithful servants readily perceive the tokens of that awful change. These are the most valuable friends and guardians of nations: and even when they are so few, that the Lord will not spare communities in answer to their prayers, he will render his most terrible judgments harmless as to them. He has set his mark upon their forehead, and all things shall work together for their good. In times of prevailing wickedness they may be distinguished by their lamenting over those crimes, which others palliate and excuse. Their zeal for the honour and love to the cause of God; their compassion for souls; their hatred of sin and their spiritual-mindedness; will not suffer them to be unconcerned spectators of impiety and iniquity. Their righteous souls must needs be vexed day by day, with seeing and hearing the works and words of ungodly men. Their prayers, examples, and endeavours, are opposed to the impetuous torrent: and when they fail to stop its progress, they are grieved and alarmed. They mourn before God to see religion run down, souls deceived, and Satan and his servants triumphing: and though spiritual consolations reconcile them to their situation for the time, yet they often desire to leave a world, where iniquity so much abounds: and they especially lament the abominations committed within the Church, because these are peculiarly dishonourable to God and destructive to the souls of men. Such persons are the friends of God, and shall be preserved for ever: if it be good for them, their lives shall be spared amidst desolating judgments; or they shall be previously taken from the evil to come; or the calamities, which cut off others in their sins, shall safely transmit their souls to heaven. But they who neither mourn for their own sins nor the sins of others, must expect no mercy: nor can any be looked on as the servants of God, who are indifferently to his cause, and unconcerned at the abominations that are committed against him. In temporal calamities, even infants are often involved in the common destruction: in the eternal punishment of the wicked, no discrimination will be regarded, except with reference to degrees of guilt: and in this respect, they, who have been nearest to God in profession, privilege, or office, will be most severely punished. If we be saved whilst others perish, we must ascribe the difference wholly to the mercy of our God; for we too have deserved wrath: and we should still continue to plead in behalf of our fellow sinners, for the remnant of the Church, and for the continuance and revival of religion upon earth. But indeed the wickedness of man is

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. 2. The living creatures, which were before described, (i.) are here called cherubim. The cherubim that covered the mercy-seat, and that were placed in the holy of holies, or were figured upon different parts of the tabernacle and temple, were evidently emblematic of the holy angels, as fellow worshippers of the God of Israel; and the same seems to be the meaning of the word in every other passage of Scripture. (Marg. Ref.) From the great similarity betwixt the living creatures in the visions of Ezekiel, and of those in that of St. John. (Rev. iv.) commentators have generally concluded that they must be coincident. Hence many have explained the living creatures in St. John's vision of the holy angels: but their joining in the song, "Thou hast redeemed us to God with thy blood." forms an insuperable objection to this, as well as to the unaccountable opinion of some, who would explain them to mean the three persons in the Trinity, and the human nature of Christ. Hence others, perceiving that the ministers and churches of Christ must be meant in St. John's vision, have interpreted Ezekiel's cherubim and wheels of the same: yet the latter is not a prophecy of what would come to pass under the Christian dispensation, but a representation of what was about to take place at Jerusalem. No good reason can be given, why the two visions should mean precisely the same thing; angels, as employed in God's providential government of the world, and faithful ministers, as employed in the affairs of the Church, may well be supposed, in different degrees, endued with the same gifts and actuated by similar principles; and so capable of being represented by the same emblems or hieroglyphics: for doubtless the former are, what the latter ought to be and would be. Nor should it be overlooked, that the cherubim had "every one four faces" (21.) whilst St. John's living creatures had the same faces divided among them. The wheels in Ezekiel are vastly different from the twenty-four elders in St. John, and admit of, may require, a different explication. As therefore the whole of these visions and the context direct our thoughts to the dealings of God with the Jewish nation, especially in the destruction of the city and temple by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans; as the cherubim in the Scripture, generally at least, denote angels; and as wheels are a far apter emblem of the course of providence, than of any thing in the constitution of the Christian Church; inasmuch that the heathen painted fortune, (which we consider as the secret appointment of God,) with a wheel, as an emblem of the same vicissitudes of human affairs: the interpretation already given seems far more consistent with the scope of the passage, and more satisfactory than that referred to. The prophet saw above the cherubim, as he had done before, (i. 26.) the likeness of a throne, and doubtless as the appearance of a man upon it, who spake to him that was clothed in linen, who had been employed in marking the servants of God in the forehead; and he ordered him to go in between the wheels, under the cherub, (for one was connected with each of the wheels,) and thence to take burning coals, and scatter them over the city. Thus the burning of Jerusalem, as well as the slaughter of its inhabitants, was emblematically predicted. We suppose him that sat upon the throne to have been the eternal Son of God, the second person in the sacred Trinity; and the vision to represent his glory as the King of Israel, appearing from above the mercy-seat: the fire therefore from between the wheels, under the cherubim, seems to have signified the wrath of God, to be executed by the Chaldeans upon Jerusalem, for their contempt of the Lord's mercy, their abuse of his favours, their profanation of his ordinances and temple, the wickedness of the priests, and their murder of the prophets. (Notes. i.)

wheels, from between the cherubims ; then he went in, and stood beside the wheels

7 And one cherub * stretched forth his hand from between the cherubims, unto the fire that was between the cherubims, and took thereof, and put it into the hands of him that was clothed with linen : who took it, ' and went out.

8 ¶ And there appeared in the cherubims ^e the form of a man's hand under their wings.

9 And when I looked, ' behold, the four-wheels by the cherubims, ^a one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub : and the appearance of the wheels was ^a as the colour of a beryl-stone.

10 And as for their appearances, they four had one likeness, ^a as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel.

11 When they went, ^a they went upon their four sides ; they turned not as they went, but to the place ^a whither the head looked, they followed it ; they turned not as they went.

V. 3-7. The cherubin stood on the right side of the temple, which is generally supposed to mean the north side ; this might point out the quarter from whence destruction would come ; or it intimated, that they stood at a distance from the idolaters before-mentioned. (viii.) The inner court also was filled with the cloud : the Lord had taken possession of his temple by this appearance, (1 Kings viii. 10, 11.) and he thus intimated that he was now about to withdraw from it. At the same time the visible glory removed to the threshold of the house ; (Note, ix. 3, 4.) and then the court was filled with brightness, perhaps illuminating the cloud. Some think that it was the outer court that was filled with brightness, whilst the inner was filled with the dark cloud ; denoting that the Lord would leave the Jews in darkness, and send his light unto the Gentiles. At the same time the sound of the cherubim's wings was heard without, " as the voice of the almighty God " when he speaketh : " i. e. like the sound of most tremendous thunder, or like the voice heard from mount Sinai when the law was given ; which might intimate their triumphant admiration of the glorious justice and holiness of God in these awful dispensations, or the report that would be made of them to distant nations. Accordingly, when the man clothed in linen proceeded to execute his commission, one of the cherubim handed to him the fire, and he took it and went out, prepared to scatter it over the city ; and this may denote, that the holy angels concur with each other in executing the divine mandates, whether of mercy or of judgment.

V. 11. Head, &c. The Spirit, that directed their motions, or " the appearance of a Man upon the throne," who presided over them, (Notes, i. 5-14.)

15 And the cherubims were ^c lifted up. ^d This is the living creature that I saw by the river of Chebar.

16 And ^e when the cherubims went, the wheels went by them ; and when the cherubims lifted up their wings to mount up from the earth, the same wheels also turned not from beside them.

17 When they stood, these stood ; and when they were lifted up, these lifted up themselves also : ' for the spirit † of the living creature was in them.

V. 12. This circumstance, as it related to the living creatures, was not before-mentioned : by the living creatures, (as well as the wheels,) being full of eyes in every part, their constant watchfulness, and their penetration, sagacity, and circumspection, may be denoted, (Rev. iv. 8.) ' The wheels were full of eyes round about ; to show, ' that, however the course and event of things seem so ' unstable and uncertain, as if all ran upon wheels ; and ' there does also appear a certain intricacy and perplex- ' ity in the proceedings thereof : yet that the infinite and ' most wise providence of God had foreseen and forcere- ' dained all things to his own holy purposes.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 13. O Wheel. Or, Move round. ' They are put ' in mind of continually attending upon their duty ; for ' the wheels and living creatures were animated with the ' same principle of understanding and motion.' (Lowth.) —If our translation be retained, the call to the four wheels, as one, may denote the unity of design and operation, which form the innumerable dispensations of Providence into one grand and consistent plan.

V. 14. Some have concluded from this verse, that the same faces were also marked upon the wheels ; but it seems rather to be meant of the living creatures. The face of a cherub being here substituted for that of an ox in the former vision ; it is generally thought that the cherubim in the temple were delineated with the countenances of oxen : yet the oxen and the cherubim are separately mentioned in one place. (1 Kings vii. 29.) If, however, this was the case, the hieroglyphical meaning alone should be attended to. (i. 10.)

V. 18, 19. The glory of the Lord, departing from the threshold of the temple, removed to a greater distance, and rested above the cherubim: and they lifted up their wings, mounted with the wheels from the earth, and abode over the east-gate of the temple, as about entirely to remove from it. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The holy angels, who watch over and minister to the saints of God, are often employed as the executioners of his vengeance on hypocrites and the enemies of his Church: (Acts xii. 7—10. 23.) Our God, from his mercy-seat between the cherubim, is a consuming fire to all who despise his great salvation: and his severest judgments will fall on those who abuse peculiar privileges, and are emboldened in their crimes by his patience and mercy.— Those awful dispensations, which excite the blasphemous objections and complaints of ungodly men, are viewed by holy angels as bright displays of the divine glory, and are celebrated with loud acclamations of praise and adoration. The terror of JEHOVAH's justice and holiness, and the examples of his indignation against his rebellious creatures, do not in the least interrupt their confidence, joy, and love: nor would they disquiet those whom Jesus hath delivered from the wrath to come; were it not for the weakness of their faith and the prevalence of their sins,

MOREOVER, ^{the} Spirit lifted me up, and brought me unto ^{the} east gate of the Lord's house, which looketh eastward: and, ^{behold}, at the door of the gate five and twenty men; among whom I saw ^{Jaazaniah} the son of Azur, and ^{Pelatiah} the son of Benaiah, princes of the people.

which obscure the evidence of their reconciliation to God, and mar the comfort of their communion with him. Otherwise, what should Christians have to fear? All judgment is administered by him "who loved them and gave himself for them, to redeem them to God with his blood;" he is Head over all things to his Church, and all the angels are his ministering servants for their benefit. Let us then give diligence to make our calling and election sure; and in our several stations, as ministers or private Christians, let us copy the example of the holy angels, and walk circumspectly and intelligently; obey with promptitude and alacrity; and give up ourselves to be led by the Spirit of God, and disposed of in his providence, as he sees good. He will assuredly order every thing in perfect wisdom, truth, and love: we need fear nothing but hypocrisy, coming short of his grace, grieving the Holy Spirit, or dishonouring the Gospel. As the departure of God from Churches or nations must prove their ruin; so his departure, for a time and in part, from a believer who has offended him, must occasion great distress and anguish, and sometimes cause him to say, "The pains of hell have got hold of me." What then will be the case of those to whom the righteous Judge shall at last say, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels?" Let this consideration warn sinners "to seek the Lord, while he may be found, and to call upon him while he is near;" and also excite us all to walk watchfully and humbly with our God.

five men at the east-gate of the temple: but it is uncertain whether they were the same with the twenty-five men beforementioned; (viii. 16.) as they were not worshipping idols, but consulting about public affairs. It does not appear that they belonged to the sanhedrim, or great council of the nation; yet they were princes or nobles, who had great influence in the measures of government. Some writers inform us, that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four districts, over each of which there was a prince or president, and one that was over them all was the ruler of the city. Amongst these princes the prophet distinguished two, who seem to have been the most eminent: and the Lord informed him, that this company, especially the two mentioned by name, were the persons that devised mischief and gave evil counsel in the city. Probably they encouraged idolatry, countenanced the false prophets, and persecuted the true prophets. They counselled the revolt from the Chaldeans, the alliance with Egypt, and the pertinacious opposition to the besiegers, in defiance of the warnings and predictions of God by Jeremiah and other prophets. They persuaded the people, that if there were any truth in the predictions of divine judgments on the city and land, they would not be fulfilled for a long time; that they might build houses, and attend to their temporal concerns, without any apprehensions. And in derision of Jeremiah's vision of a seething pot, (Jer. i. 13.) they added, that they were the flesh in this pot or caldron, the walls of the city would protect them against the Chaldeans, as the caldron keeps the fire from the flesh that is in it; that if they attempted to take them out, it would be at their peril. Thus they taught the people to harden themselves in rebellion against God. Some render the third verse thus: "Houses should not be built near the city: for it is about to be the caldron, and we the flesh." But this interpretation does not agree with the general tenour of the chapter.

V. 5—12. Under the immediate impulse of the Holy Spirit, the prophet in vision seemed to himself to deliver the following message to these counsellors of rebellion: and this being afterwards written, and published, would come to their knowledge. He first reminded them of the wicked words which they had spoken; and assured them that the Lord was exactly acquainted with all their secret thoughts, counsels, and designs, their vain hopes, and rebellious devices. He next charged them, not only with shedding the blood of prophets and righteous men by their oppressions and persecutions; but also with murdering all the Jews, who had been or would be slain in the war, in which they so obstinately persisted: so that they multiplied their slain in the streets of the city. The city was indeed a caldron; and they who perished by their fault, by the sword and famine during the siege, were the flesh that should continue and be consumed in it; but that they themselves would be brought forth out of it: (Notes, xxv. 1—13.) And as they had feared being put to death, if they surrendered to the Chaldeans, and had therefore determined to stand out to the last extremity, so they should be slain by the sword: the Lord would deliver them into the hand of the Chaldeans, and by their hands execute his judgments upon them; for Nebuchadnezzar would put them to death as criminals, at Riblah in the border of the land. (Marg. Ref.) Then it would appear that the city was not their caldron, and that they were not able to continue in it: seeing they had not obeyed the Lord, but had copied the idolatries and iniquities of all the surrounding nations.

V. 13. Whilst the prophet, in vision, was delivering this message to these princes, Pelatiah suddenly died. It is probable that he was actually cut off by some terrible death at Jerusalem at this time, or afterwards, when the prophecy was fulfilling; and in so remarkable a manner, of fallen man. The carnal heart, like a stone, cannot be made to feel. Judgments, mercies, warnings, examples, are alike unavailing. The terrors from mount Sinai, the love of Christ, and the sweet promises of the Gospel, fail alike of producing suitable affections. Men live unconcerned amidst the dead and dying; they accumulate loads of guilt like mountains, and are neither dismayed nor humbled; and they often are as unfeeling to the miseries of others, as to their own danger. They are dead, insensible, and like a stone, that feels nothing from the hardest blow. But renewing grace creates a susceptibility of proper feeling in the soul and conscience: then a sinner learns to fear God, to stand in awe of his word, and to flee from his wrath. Then the mercies of God excite his gratitude, and the promises encourage his hope; he is humbled for his transgressions of the law; and unites love and gratitude with still deeper humiliation, by his knowledge of the Gospel. Then his heart becomes broken, his conscience tender, his affections easily moved to fear or compassion: a wrong temper now causes him more pain than numerous gross crimes once did; and the consideration of the shortness and uncertainty of life produces, in some measure, its proper effect on his conduct. His heart becomes as living flesh, which feels the least touch, and is now capable of joy and sorrow from spiritual objects, which before it was not. This change the Lord alone can work, and he promised to do it for Israel, in order that they might walk in his statutes; for without it spiritual obedience and worship cannot be performed: and thus he would be their God, and own them as his people. (Marg. Ref.) But though this must be interpreted as a prophecy of the restoration of the Jews and some of the Israelites to their own land; yet it is applicable, in its largest sense, to the true Israel, the elect of God, who all partake of this blessing in due season: and it seems also to foretel the future conversion of the Jews to Christ. ^c Conversion is commonly spoken of in Scripture, as if it were a new creation, because of the new dispositions and powers which accompany it. ^d These promises chiefly relate to the conversion of the Jews, when God shall pour on them the Spirit of grace. (Zech. xii. 10.) (Lonth.)

V. 21. The hearts of almost all the Jews in Jerusalem and Judah, and of numbers among the captives, walked after the heart of their detestable things. Their affections were habitually fixed upon idols; they were disposed to copy the licentiousness, cruelty, and fraud, which these supposed deities were represented to delight in; and they loved their gross and carnal worship. Or they took as much pleasure in worshipping Satan, (who was worshipped under the names and forms of all their idols,) as he did in receiving their adoration. And none of those who continued to act in this manner could have any interest in these promises; but they would be recompensed according to their own ways. ^e Notwithstanding the mercies reserved for the penitent, the prophet mentions the heart of their detestable things,—because evil spirits, who were worshipped in and by them, were pleased with the devotions in that manner paid to them. (Lonth.)

V. 22—25. After the prophet had received all this information, he saw the cherubim and the wheels, with the glory of God above them, remove to a greater distance: they had before left the temple, and now they departed from the city eastward to the mount of Olives; the place from which Christ, the glory of the second temple, ascended into heaven, previous to its destruction. Then the prophet was, in vision, brought back into Chaldea, in the same way that he had been conveyed thence: the vision left him, his ecstasy terminated, and he found himself among the elders where he was at first. And afterwards he reported to them, and the other captives, all that he had seen and heard in this vision, (Notes, viii—xi.) and perhaps he also now explained the other signs which he had before shown to them. (Notes, iv—vii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

When those that are eminent in rank or abilities are destitute of the fear of God, and ridicule his truths and warnings, they are qualified to be extensively mischievous. Being ingenious in devising evil, plausible in counselling and vindicating it, and bold in carrying it into execution, they encourage numbers to harden themselves in rebellion against God, and to adopt and persist in the most pernicious and impious desigus. But they should be reminded, that they must render an account to him, for all the mischief done by their influence; for all the blood shed in unjust and unnecessary wars, which their worldly policy has occasioned; and for all the murder that takes place in consequence of their oppression, persecution, and unrighteous decrees. How awfully do some men of this description multiply their slain, not only through the streets of a single city, or the districts of a kingdom, but through every quarter of the globe! and they will at length be as much distinguished by their punishment, as they now are by their crimes. But carnal policy is connected with infi-

CHAP. XII.

Ezekiel is ordered, by removing his goods, and breaking through the wall of his house, to give the people a sign of the taking of Jerusalem, of Zedekiah's flight, and of the captivity of the Jews, 1—16; by eating and drinking with trembling and anxiety, to prefigure the famine, and consternation of the Jews during the siege, 17—20; and to declare that this ruin was near at hand, as a rebuke to those who profanely spake of it as distant, 21—28.

THE word of the Lord also came unto me, saying,
 2 Son of man, ^a thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, ^b which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house.

3 Therefore, thou son of man, ^c prepare thee * stuff for removing, and remove by day in their sight: and thou shalt remove from thy place to another place in their sight: ^d it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious house.

delity: and such persons turn the oracles of God into ridicule, and persuade themselves and others that no evil shall happen unto them. If they cannot entirely shake off all regard to revelation, they conclude, that the wrath of God denounced against transgressors is doubtful, or at least distant; and that they may safely indulge their inclinations, and pursue their rebellious schemes for some time longer; that they have many years of life before them, and shall be able to take care of their souls at last. The love of the world, and dislike to religion, give Satan and his factors an amazing advantage against men, in tempting them to this prostration: and thus they seduce, and ruin one another, until at last, when they are crying, Peace, peace, sudden destruction overtakes them, from which they cannot possibly escape. We should therefore plainly protest against these devisers of mischief, and wicked counsellors: we should show them the folly and impicity of their wicked words, and remind them that God knoweth all their thoughts and contrivances. We should also meditate on the same truths, with reference to ourselves: that we may watch our hearts and lips, and beg of God to examine and keep them for us. The worst fears of ungodly men will come upon them, and often by those sinful means which they use to secure themselves: and when sinners fear the sword of man more than the wrath of God, he will sometimes expose them to both, and execute his judgments upon them in this world as well as in the next. Thus he often singles out the ringleaders in impiety, infidelity, and wickedness, and renders them warnings to others, that they may repent and avoid such destructive paths. But though these awful dispensations verify the words of God's faithful servants; yet they cannot but be deeply affected by them: and will still plead with him to have mercy on those who remain.

V. 14—25.

The Lord often reserves for himself those persons of whom we had little hopes: and leaves to their own pride and lusts, such as we had the best expectations of: while they whom he afflicts and man despises, are commonly nearer the kingdom of heaven than their more prosperous and self-confident neighbours. Many are ready to imagine that they are exclusively the people of God, while others are gone far from him; when in fact they are idolizing some form or creed, and have no part nor lot in the matter: and they who rejoice in the calamities of their brethren, because they expect gain from them, and who are ready to anathematize and injure them for conscience' sake, are strangers to the power of godliness. But wherever the Lord casts the lot of those who truly fear him, he will be a Sanctuary unto them: they cannot be scattered at a distance from his protecting providence, from his throne of grace, from the consolations of his Spirit, or communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ: and he will gather into his heavenly kingdom, from every country under heaven, all those who have been delivered by his grace from all their detestable things and abominations. But without the one heart and the new spirit, which he bestows; except he take away the hard and stony heart, and give us the heart of flesh, we shall never truly repent, or believe and obey the Gospel. When the sinner feels his need of these blessings, let him bring these promises to the throne of grace, and present them as prayers in the name of Christ, and they will surely be performed. Then sin will be loathed, the Saviour will become precious, the heart will be made humble and contrite, the conscience tender; and the converted sinner will be inclined and enabled to walk in the Lord's statutes, and keep his ordinances and do them. Such are indeed the Lord's people, and he is their God and Portion: but they differ as much from notional professors of evangelical truths, as from Pharisaical despisers of them: and this sensibility of heart and conscience is the chief discrimination betwixt the true Christian and all other men. As for those whose hearts are habitually set upon their idolatries and iniquities; they are evidently under the dominion and condemnation of their sins, and the Lord will deal with them according to the covenant of works, and recompense their ways upon their own heads. And though he will not forsake his people; yet he may be driven away from any part of his visible Church, by the hypocrisy and iniquity of those who are called by his name: and wo be to them, when he withdraws his presence, glory, and protection! Finally, whatever ministers learn from the word or Spirit of God, whether concerning his judgments or his mercies, they must faithfully declare it all to the people, as far as they have opportunity afforded them.

4 Then shalt thou bring forth thy stuff by day in their sight, as stuff for removing: and thou shalt go forth as if even in their sight, as * they that go forth into captivity.

5 † Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby.

6 In their sight shalt thou bear it upon thy shoulders, and carry it forth in the twilight: thou shalt † cover thy face, that thou see not the ground: † for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel.

7 And ^b I did so as I was commanded: I brought forth my stuff by day, as stuff for captivity, and in the even I † digged through the wall with mine hand; I brought it forth in the twilight, and I bare it upon my shoulder in their sight.

8 ¶ And in the morning came the word of the LORD unto me, saying,

9 Son of man, hath not the house of Israel, ^a the rebellious house, said unto thee, † What doest thou?

10 Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; ^m This burden concerneth the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them.

11 Say, I am your sign: like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall † remove and go into captivity.

12 And ^o the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth: they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby: he shall cover his face, that he see not the ground with his eyes.

13 My ^p net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: ^q and I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there.

14 And ^r I will scatter toward every wind all that are about him to help him, and all his bands; ^s and I will draw out the sword after them.

15 And ^t they shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall scatter them among the nations, and disperse them in the countries.

16 But ^u I will leave ¶ a few men of them from the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence; ^x that they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come; ^y and they shall know that I am the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1-7. Ezekiel seems not, for the present, to have had any more visions of the divine glory; but to have received the revelations of the Lord's will, in the more ordinary manner of other prophets. Even the captives among whom he dwelt, were a rebellious house like their brethren in Judah; who would not use their senses and faculties, or avail themselves of the instructions of God's word and providence, for their advantage. After all that they had heard and experienced, they still expected that Jerusalem would be preserved from the Chaldeans, they deemed themselves unhappy in bondage, and hoped to be speedily restored to their country: this led them to neglect the duties of their situation, to listen to false prophets, to reject the word of God, and thus to rebel both against his commandments and providence. To certify them therefore of the vanity of their hopes, the prophet was ordered to make ready his furniture for removing to another habitation, in the sight of the people, and then to carry it, or some part of it, to a distant place; in hopes, (speaking after the manner of men,) "that the people would consider, though they were a rebellious house." Thus he was directed to spend the day about his furniture; and in the evening to go forth as one that was afraid of being carried away captive: and to render his conduct more significant, he was to dig or break through the wall of his house, and to go forth by that opening, carrying part of his property or some provisions with him, as desirous to escape the enemy; and to cover his face, not only as in distress, but to disguise himself for fear of being detected. Having received such orders, he punctually obeyed them; and thus set before the eyes of the captive Jews the plundering of Jerusalem of all its treasures, and the removal of them and of the inhabitants to Babylon; the vain endeavours of the Jews to escape, and to carry off their property; and especially the conduct and fate of king Zedekiah.

V. 8-16. Either the people had ridiculed the prophet's conduct, or they had contemptuously disregarded it. He was therefore commanded to inform them, that this burden, or prophetic sign of impending judgments, respected Zedekiah the prince in Jerusalem, under whose shadow they hoped to live among the nations; as well as all those of the families of Israel, who yet remained in their own land. As Ezekiel had removed his furniture, and changed his habitation; so would their property and persons be removed into another land: and the king himself would flee from the conquerors in the dust of the evening, with a burden on his shoulder and a covering on his face, in order to disguise himself; whilst his attendants would break through the wall to forward his escape. But the Lord would spread his net for him, and take him in his snare: for the Chaldeans would overtake him, and carry him to Babylon; yet he should not see that city, though he should die there. Jeremiah had predicted, that his eyes should see the eyes of the king of Babylon. (Jer. xxxiv. 3;) and here Ezekiel foretold, that he should not

17 ¶ Moreover, the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

18 Son of man, ² eat thy bread with quaking, and drink thy water with trembling, and with carefulness ;

19 And say unto the people of the land, Thus saith the Lord God of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of the land of Israel ; They shall eat their bread ^a with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment, ^b that her land may be desolate from ^c all that is therein, ^e because of the violence of all them that dwell therein.

20 And ^d the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste, and the land shall be desolate ; and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

21 ¶ And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

22 Son of man, ^o what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, 'The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth ?

23 Tell them therefore, Thus saith the Lord God ; ⁸ I will make this proverb to cease, and they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel ; but say unto them, ^h The days are at hand, and the effect of every vision.

24 For there shall be ⁱ no more any vain vision, nor flattering divination within the house of Israel.

25 For I am the LORD : ^k I will speak, and the word that I shall speak shall come to pass ; it shall be no more prolonged : for ^l in your days, ^m O rebellious house, will I say the word, and will perform it, saith the Lord God.

26 ¶ Again the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

27 Son of man, behold, they of the house of Israel say, The vision that he seeth is ^o for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are far off.

28 Therefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God ; ^o There shall none of my words be prolonged any more, but the word which I have spoken shall be done, saith the Lord God.

see Babylon ; and Josephus says that he thought these two prophecies inconsistent with each other, and therefore believed neither of them : but both were exactly accomplished, when he was brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Bבלah, and there had his eyes put out, and was carried to Babylon.—The Lord moreover declared, that all the Jews, who adhered to Zedekiah and survived the taking of the city, should be scattered through the nations, and be pursued by his judgments ; and by the accomplishment of these predictions, they should be convinced that he was the eternal JEHOVAH, the Creator and Lord of all. Yet he would leave a remnant of them, that should escape all the divers kinds of death, which cut off the rest ; and who might declare among the heathen all their abominations. Either their conduct would be so very vile, that the heathen might see the reason of the Lord's dealings with them, by witnessing their abandoned wickedness ; or, being brought to repentance, they would confess their abominable idolatries and iniquities, and acknowledge the justice of God in his severity towards them ; that so the heathen also might be made acquainted with the power, truth, and holiness of Israel's God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—20. The Lord next directed the prophet to instruct the people by another sign. Whenever he ate or drank, he was to act like a man in great terror and anxiety ; as if he feared that somebody would rob him of his food, or as if he were eating his last meal, and must then perish by hunger and thirst. This denoted that the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and those that remained in the land, would soon endure far greater miseries than their captive brethren had done ; when they would, with astonishment, terror, and execrating solicitude, perceive famine increasing upon them, and expect to have their scanty morsel taken from them by some other starving wretches, or to be slain while eating it : or that they must soon eat their last meal, and then die miserably by hunger. For the city and land would surely and speedily be desolated ; because of the violence and oppression of the inhabitants.

V. 21—25. Emboldened by the long-suffering of God, and despising the declarations of his prophets, the Jews, (both in captivity and in the land of Israel,) commonly used to say to each other, "The days are prolonged, and every vision faileth ;" so that this became a proverb among them. They had been long threatened and were still spared ; and they concluded that the visions of the prophets had failed. But the Lord assured them, that the event should speedily cause this impious proverb to cease ; for the days were at hand, when every vision would take effect. Then the false prophets would be silenced, and their lying divinations detected ; for the Lord would speak by his prophets, and cause his word to be noticed by immediately performing it, in their days, and upon the very persons to whom it was spoken.

V. 26—28. Perhaps, after the former message, the Jews altered their proverb ; and, instead of saying that the vision failed, they only said, that it related to remote times, and distant events. Or this proverb was used, at the same time, by such as did not openly avow their infidelity. The Lord, however, ordered his prophet to assure them, that the time of his patience was expiring, and that he would immediately fulfil his most alarming predictions. This could not, at the most, be more than four or five years before the destruction of Jerusalem.

 Because ye have spoken vanity, and enter his protest against them, as the other prophets had done. 'The true prophets often denounce God's judgments against the false ones; laying to their charge many misdemeanors in their private conversation; and upbraiding them for unfaithfulness in the office they undertook, of guiding and directing men's consciences.' (Louth.)

 Some of the false prophets lived in Judah, and others of them among the captives in Chaldea. They vaunted themselves to be, and were considered by many as, the prophets of Israel; but they were the ruin of the people who confided in them. Ezekiel was therefore required to prophesy against them, not so much in expectation of bringing them to repentance, as in order to undeceive those whom they deluded. They had the character of being very discerning men, and were no doubt proud of their wisdom: but they were foolish prophets; because they followed their own fancies, and had received no revelations from God, though they audaciously ventured to speak in his name. Israel therefore must be informed, that their favoured prophets were like foxes in the deserts: that is, crafty, ravenous, and mischievous; always scheming something for their own interest, or shifting about to save themselves, without regard to the welfare of the people: thus they spoiled the Lord's vineyard, and devoured his flock; as the foxes from the desert marred the vineyards, and did mischief in the sheep-folds, of Canaan. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The wickedness of Israel had broken down the hedge of the divine protection, and opened a gap or breach for their enemies to enter at. And as, when such breaches are made in the walls of besieged cities, the officers and soldiers that defend them repair thither, and venture their lives in withstanding the foe, till the breach be built up again; so the prophets of Israel ought to have ventured all consequences, in endeavouring to bring the people to repentance: as well as to have opposed their prayers, examples, and instructions, to the prevalence of ungodliness, and the divine judgments which were coming upon them.

 But the false prophets attempted nothing of the kind: they neither sought to avert the approaching calamities, nor to prepare the people for them; but rather encouraged them to harden themselves against God, who had declared that he was coming to fight against them by the Chaldeans.

V. 6. The false prophets spake with such confidence and plausibility, and their predictions so accorded to the wishes of the people, that they assuredly expected to see them accomplished.

V. 9. The indignation of God would fall especially upon the false prophets, whose covetous carnal minds made them susceptible of strong impressions from the illusions of Satan: so that they first wilfully imposed on the people; and probably were afterwards judicially given up to strong delusions, to believe their own lies, and to expect that the Jews would prosper in resisting the Chaldeans. Thus they saw vanity and lying divination, and then they prophesied lies; and their predictions as much contradicted their former Scriptures, as they did the prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and other later prophets. The Lord therefore declared, that they should not be in the assembly of Israel; either they would become open apostates, or be detected and excommunicated, or cut off by death: their names also would be expunged from the registers of the house of Israel; and their families should either be extinct, or not be able to claim any inheritance among those who returned from captivity; which would be an emblem of their exclusion from heaven, as not having their names written in the book of life.

V. 10—16. The peculiar guilt of these prophets consisted in their seducing the worshippers of God into idolatry and iniquity, and encouraging them to harden themselves in impenitence, by assuring them of peace and prosperity, at the very time when divine judgments were about to be poured out upon them. In this manner, perhaps, some one of them courted the favour of the people: and the rest, finding him caressed and followed, supported his false predictions by their confident assertions and vain reasonings. Thus they acted, as if a man were to build a wall with loose stones or bricks of earth, without cement; and others should labour to give it an appearance of stability, by daubing it over with mortar made of bad materials, and not properly mixed or tempered; and they should then expect that such a wall would protect them, or that a house built of such walls would serve for a secure habitation. The people supposed themselves safe from the assaults of the Chaldeans, because they vainly presumed, that, as the people of God, he was engaged by covenant to preserve them; not considering that they had forfeited the blessing by their crimes: and the prophets laboured to varnish over these presumptuous expectations by a variety of specious pretences. But the Lord by his prophet assured them that this worthless wall should certainly fall down, notwithstanding all their daubing. A tremendous shower of rain and hail would wash away all the untempered mortar, and then the stormy wind would rend the wall itself. This storm, arising from his righteous indignation, would level the wall to the ground and destroy its foundations, and consume those who builded it, or sheltered themselves under it, in its own destruction. That is, the Lord would send the Chaldeans to besiege and destroy Jerusalem, and desolate Judah; they would come with such force and fury as the Jews could by no means withstand; and their success would confute the lying predictions of the prophets, and subvert the false hopes of the people. When these events should take place, the false prophets would be reproached and taunted with their folly and presumption; till the Lord had accomplished his wrath upon them: and then they who trusted them, would be reminded by God and his prophets, that "the wall was no more, neither they who daubed it." The latter part of the eleventh verse may be rendered thus: "I will send great hail-stones; they shall fall; and the storm of a whirlwind shall rend it."

V. 17—23. As the Lord endured some women with the Spirit of prophecy: so there were others, who pretended to it from secular motives. But the prophet was ordered to set his face against them too, and to charge them with prophesying out of their own hearts. As a token of the peace and security which they promised, they sewed pillows to their own arm-holes, or elbows, (20.) and to theirs who consulted them; intimating that they might indulge and repose themselves in security, for no enemy would disturb them. The meaning of the kerchiefs, or coverings, which they put "upon the head of every stature," (or of persons of every age indiscriminately,) is not so evident: some think that they were ornaments, with which they decorated those who consulted them, in token of victory and triumph; others suppose, that this was spoken figuratively, for their hoodwinking them, or keeping them in the dark by their delusions; but probably it was some superstitious observance, a kind of amulet or charm, that they employed to entice the people into their snares. These women would tell every man his fortune, giving them pillows to lean on, and kerchiefs to cover their head; to the intent they might the more allure them. For they thus hunted their souls; and, as it seems probable, not only promised the nation deliverance from the Chaldeans, but professed to protect by some spell or charm the lives of those who applied to them; nay, even to save their souls, by some absolution or indulgence which they vended. Thus they entangled the people in their deceptions, as if they could save the lives and souls of men, without any respect to their conduct and character. They seem to have been a company of fortune-tellers, who polluted or profaned the name of God, by pretending to sell his gifts at the most contemptible price; and to deal in divination, and such like impositions, as have in every age found eager purchasers. And they likewise attempted to terrify with denunciations of wrath, those pious persons who refused to bribe them; as if life and death, heaven and hell, were at their disposal! Thus they worked upon the fears and hopes of those who attended to their lies. But the Lord declared that he was against them, and all their signs and charms with which they terrified souls, to cause them to fly into their entangling net: and he would certainly tear them from them, expose them to shame, and deliver the people from their influence and power. Because their lies counteracted the intention and tendency of his word; distressing the minds of upright godly men, or grieving them, whilst they saw God dishonoured and souls deceived: whereas the whole revealed will of God tended to encourage such persons, and to make them joyful. On the other hand, their divinations tended to harden and embolden wicked men, by encouraging them to expect peace and safety in their evil ways; contrary to the express declarations of God, that "there is no peace for the wicked." He would therefore speedily terminate their delusions, and deliver his people, and so make his power and glory known to all concerned. To slay and to make alive, signify here to promise men life, or threaten them with death: so the prophet saith, he "came to destroy the city," (xliii. 2.) that is, to pronounce the sentence of destruction upon it. (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

Many possess great subtlety and sagacity, who are utterly destitute of true wisdom: and whilst the world admires their abilities, the Lord brands them as fools. This is most awfully the case with numbers, who make the sacred ministry a step to worldly consequence and affluence. They pretend to speak in the name of God; but have seen nothing of his glory, of the evil of sin, the worth of souls, the preciousness of Christ, the way of salvation, or the beauty of holiness! they follow their own fancies, human traditions, or Satan's illusions; and then ascribe the whole to the God of truth! they are subtle, rapacious, and insinuating, in winding themselves into favour and preferment, and pursuing filthy lucre; but they are sure to do mischief in the fold and vineyard of the Lord. Instead of standing in the gap to turn away his indignation from the people, by their prayers, holy examples, and zealous endeavours to promote true godliness, they widen the breach by their wicked lives and erroneous doctrines, their soothing and flattering delusions, which cause men to think themselves deserving of eternal life, even when the wrath of God abideth on them! Numbers follow the pernicious ways of such false teachers, "by reason of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of;" and many are seduced to expect the accomplishment of their unscriptural assertions. But the Lord is against them, and hath not sent them: they shall not be written among the righteous, nor share the heavenly inheritance: Because, even because they seduce the professed worshippers of God, and promise men peace and salvation, without conversion, faith, or holiness. But indeed there are numerous ways, by which one heresiarch builds up a wall, and others daub it with untempered mortar! Some teach men to expect safety from a comparative decency of moral character; some on account of formal or superstitious observances; some because they belong to an orthodox part of the Church, and have got some notions of certain important doctrines; some because of their impressions and enthusiastic reveries; and others even by a direct abuse of the Gospel, and making Christ the minister of sin! Each of these descriptions can find specious reasonings, or a few detached perverted testimonies of Scripture, to countenance their delusions: and men of learning and ingenuity employ themselves in daubing these tottering walls with untempered mortar, to prevent their weakness from being discovered. But they are all alike distant from Christ, the true Foundation: they build not on him by a penitent faith, that worketh by love and productive obedience: they either leave out his merits and atonement, or the work of his new-creating Spirit, or the substantial fruits of righteousness; and in different ways endeavour to varnish, paint, and repair the old building; instead of erecting a new one on a new foundation, for "an habitation of God through the Spirit." How fair soever the wall, thus run up and 16 Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God; ¹ Repent, and turn * yourselves from your idols; and ^m turn away your faces from all your abominations.

7 For every one of the house of Israel, or ^o of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which ^o separateth himself from me, ^p and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face, ^q and cometh to a prophet to inquire of him concerning me; ^r I the Lord will answer him ^r by myself:

8 And ^s I will set my face against that man, and will make him ^t a sign and a proverb, and ^u I will cut him off from the midst of my people; ^v and ye shall know that I am the Lord.

9 And ^w if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord will answer him, saying,

10 The word of the Lord came against me, saying,

11 Son of man, when the land sinneth against me by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out mine hand upon it, and will ^x break the staff of the bread thereof, and will send famine upon it, ^y and will cut off man and beast from it:

⁴ but they have actually set up idols and worshipped them. (Lowth.) Could it then consist with the glory of God to give a favourable answer to the inquiries of such hypocrites? On the contrary, the prophet was instructed plainly to inform them, that the Lord had determined to answer all Israelites, without respect of rank or station, who came with idolatrous hearts to inquire of him, according to the multitude of their idols; either denouncing vengeance upon them proportioned to their aggravated crimes, or giving them up to be deluded to their ruin. Thus he would ensnare them in their own counsels, leave them to manifest the concealed wickedness of their hearts, show the world their abominable dispositions, and render them contemptible and miserable: seeing they were all totally alienated from him, through an infatuated attachment to idolatry. — That I may deal with them according to their deserts, ⁴ and thereby convince them, that I am a Searcher of ⁴ hearts, and know the secret wickedness of their thoughts. (Lowth.) ⁴ He shall be led with lies, according as he ⁴ lighted therein?

V. 6—8. The only way to escape the threatened judgments was by repentance, and by turning themselves, and endeavouring to turn one another, from their idols to the worship and service of God; and by turning away their faces with abhorrence from all their abominations, that they might look another way, and act in another manner. Thus, and thus only, could they expect an answer of peace. For every Israelite, nay, every proselyte or stranger dwelling in the land, would be dealt with according to the foregoing rule. If in their heart they separated from the Lord, favoured idolatry, and looked towards that great occasion of iniquity: and then, out of curiosity or a desire to serve God and idols too; to save appearances, or to obtain reputation, they should consult the prophets; the 10 And ⁴ they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity: ^b the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him;

11 That ^c the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, ^d neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but ^e that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord God.

12 ¶ The word of the Lord came against me, saying,

13 Son of man, when the land sinneth against me by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out mine hand upon it, and will ^x break the staff of the bread thereof, and will send famine upon it, ^y and will cut off man and beast from it:

Lord would answer every such inquirer, not by the mouth of his prophet, but by himself and his own powerful vengeance. He would execute such punishment upon him, as should render him an example and proverb to all others; singling him out from his people, among whom he had impiously intruded; and making known his omniscience and omnipotence by detecting and avenging his crimes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. These inquirers would soon be weary of consulting God's prophets, and be disposed to apply to those of another character; who would be left, (like Ahab's prophets,) to the illusions of a lying spirit; and thus being deceived themselves, to believe that prosperity would attend the inquirers, they would deceive them also. This the Lord warned such men to expect: for he meant thus to punish their hatred of his truth and service. Though not the author of the deceived prophet's sin; yet his being left to fall into Satan's delusions was the effect of a judicial sentence against him; and God thus used him as the instrument of blinding and hardening hypocrites to their destruction. And, as the false prophet only sought his own interest or credit in his predictions, and for that sin was given up to strong delusions to believe a lie; as the man who consulted him only sought encouragement in his idolatry and wickedness; and as the enmity of their hearts against God prepared them to welcome these delusions, which emboldened them to further rebellion: so the Lord would punish them in awful indignation, and cause them to bear the load of their atrocious guilt, which would involve both the deceived prophet and the hypocritical inquirer, in the same terrible destruction. Yet this severity to individuals would prove mercy to the house of Israel, by warning them against idolatry and iniquity, that they might still continue the people of God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13.—21. The faith, obedience, and prayers of Noah prevailed to the saving of his house; though not of the old world : and he was assured that the earth should not be deluged a second time. Job's sacrifice and intercession in behalf of his friends were accepted : and Daniel had prevailed with God for the discovery of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, by which his companions and the wise men of Babylon were preserved from death. (Notes, Dan. ii.) (It was a singular honour for Daniel, who was not at this time above thirty years of age, to be ranked with these ancient eminent saints of God, who were most honoured by the answers given to their prayers in their own time.) Yet if these three eminent saints of different ages had all lived at once, and united in intercession for a land which was ripe for judgment, they would not have prevailed. But their righteousness would either have exempted them from temporal calamities, or converted them into blessings. Not that it could be the ground of their acceptance ; but their righteous conduct would evince them to be justified persons and partakers of God's grace and favour ; and thus ensure his protection and their everlasting salvation, according to the tenour of the new covenant. The prayers, examples, and pious labours of eminent believers have often checked the progress of national wickedness, promoted reformation and true religion, and thus tended to the lengthening of public tranquillity ; and there is abundant encouragement, during the time of the Lord's patience and mercy, to use means for the conversion of children, relatives, and neighbours ; yet when that time expires and the days of vengeance arrive, no intercession can prevail for the impenitent ; nor can any righteous man deliver his nearest relations from destruction. But if this were the case with any nation, whose grievous transgressions had provoked God to commission either famine, destructive beasts, war, or pestilence, to execute his righteous vengeance upon it : if such men as Noah, Daniel, or Job, could not prevail for the preservation of a single person, even one of his own children : how much more would this be the case with Jerusalem and Judah, whose unprecedented crimes had provoked God to commission against them all these four sore judgments at once, to the total desolation of the land ! The nation therefore must not hope to escape, because of a very few pious men among them : individuals must not expect safety, because related to pious persons : nor ought Daniel, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, or other prophets, to repine, that the Lord would not preserve Jerusalem for their sakes, or in answer to their prayers.

V. 22, 23. Though the Lord determined to desolate Jerusalem and Judah, and to execute his sore judgments on the inhabitants ; yet, for his own name's sake, and out of respect to his covenant with Abraham and David, and his promises relative to the Messiah, he would preserve the lives of a remnant of Jews, both sons and daughters, that they might yet increase for the future replenishing of the land. These would be carried captive into Chaldaea : and when the few pious Jews, that were there before, should see their ways and doings, they would be comforted concerning the evil that the Lord had done to Jerusalem, perceiving that he had good cause for all the severity which he had exercised ; and taking encouragement to expect the performance of his promises of a future restoration, and many blessings to the people. It is not certain whether this consolation and satisfaction would result from noticing

CHAP. XV.

The unfitness of a vine-branch for any thing but the fire, 1—5; an emblem of the atrocious wickedness of the captives; or from hearing their penitent confessions and declarations of the crimes, which filled Jerusalem and Judah. But probably many of them showed very plainly, by their abandoned conduct, for what crimes the Lord had executed vengeance on the nation; and some others, being brought to repentance, made such a report of the abominations which they had witnessed, as silenced all objections, and composed the minds of the pious remnant to cheerful acquiescence and confidence in the truth and mercy of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Very wicked men may assume such specious appearances of piety, as to impose upon the most discerning of God's ministers: for who can know what secret abominations are practised in the lives, or what unmortified lusts abound in the hearts, of some, who behave themselves devoutly under the preaching of God's word, and the administration of his most solemn ordinances? But the Lord seeth through every disguise, and will certainly unmask every dissembler: and as his answers are addressed to men according to their characters; so we should show, as well as we can, to whom the comforts, and to whom the terrors belong; dividing the word of truth according to the character, conduct, and disposition of our hearers; and leaving the Lord, by means of their consciences, to make the application to individuals. All the wickedness of man springs from a heart estranged from the holy character, law, and service of God, through the idolatrous love of himself, and of the creatures. No external decency, form, or reformation, can be acceptable to God, so long as any idol possesses the heart and rivals him in our affections; yet how many sit to hear his word, and join in his worship and at his table, who idolize riches, pleasures, honours, and the praise of men! who seek happiness from such distinctions, and confide and rejoice in them, rather than in the love and service of God! And how many, who prefer their own wisdom and righteousness to his glorious salvation! Thus, instead of saying "What have I to do any more with idols?" and casting them away with abhorrence; they resolutely cleave to them; and these prove stumbling-blocks, over which they fall into iniquity and misery. (Marg. Ref.) By their secret attachment to worldly objects, they are prepared to be seduced by Satan, and to commit scandalous crimes; or, loving this present world, they apostatize from God; or, cares, riches, and sensual lusts, render them unfruitful cumberers of the ground, fit for nothing but to be hewn down and cast into the fire: and should the Lord be inquired of by such men, or give encouragement to them? Assuredly he will answer them according to the multitude of their idols and iniquities: he will set his face against them, and make them examples of his vengeance: whilst their hypocritical worship will only aggravate their guilt and punishment, and they shall know that the Lord cannot be imposed upon like their fellow mortals. Such persons then grow weary of faithful ministers, and want teachers after their own lusts, to comfort them in their evil courses; and they find others of like character ready enough to "teach things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake." Thus evil men and seducers are multiplied, and "grow worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" but the Lord over-rules the whole in awful righteousness to their mutual delusion and aggravated destruction. He sets his face against some such teachers and professors of the Gospel, for a warning to others; his punishments and threatenings have a tendency to alarm the consciences of the unconverted, and to caution his people to go no more astray from him; and they are made useful to upright believers. The door of mercy is still open: sinners are still called on to repent and return from all their abominations; and all are admitted amongst the Lord's people, and have him for their God, who seek to be cleansed by "washing in the Fountain" which he hath opened for sin and uncleanness.

V. 12—23.

God will inflict many sore judgments on individuals and nations who sin against him: a remnant of pious persons may indeed for a time avert, or retard national judgments; but they cannot possibly prevail with him to tolerate wickedness, or to save men in their sins: nor could they in their right mind desire it, even in behalf of their own sons and daughters. The Lord will certainly deliver his servants from all evil, and preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; and he will satisfy them as to his dealings with those for whom they pleaded in vain: but when the day of patience is expired, the same word and oath of God, which ensure the believer's salvation, are engaged for the condign punishment of the wicked. At present the whole creation groaneth through the sins of men, and the very beasts of the field in various ways share the miseries of mankind. But in the future world sinners alone will suffer, and in proportion to their personal guilt. Then the assembled universe will see, that the Lord hath not done without cause, all that he hath done against them: and his servants will be satisfied with his decisions, even against their nearest relatives. For the detection of men's sins will manifest the justice of God in their punishment; even as the humble confessions of true believers now magnify the precepts and penalty of his holy law, and give all the glory of salvation to his grace. In a firm belief that we shall approve the whole of God's dealings with ourselves and with all mankind, when it shall be fully made known to us, let us now impose silence upon our rebellious murmurs and objections, the offspring of pride, ignorance, and unbelief; let us discard our useless anxiety about the case of others, assured that the Judge of all the earth will do right; and let us compose our minds into patient resignation to his will, which in all things is holy, just, and good.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
 2 Son of man, ^a What is the vine-tree more than any tree, or than a branch which is ^b among the trees of the forest?
 3 Shall ^c wood be taken thereof to do any work? or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel thereon?
 4 Behold, ^d it is cast into the fire for fuel; ^e the fire devoureth both the ends of it, and the midst of it is burned.
 * Is it meet for any work?
 5 Behold, when it was whole, it was ^f meet for no work: how much less shall it be meet yet for any work, when the fire hath devoured it, and it is burned!
 6 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; ^g As the vine-tree among the trees of the forest, which I have given to the fire for fuel, so will I give the inhabitants of Jerusalem.
 7 And ^h I will set my face against them: ⁱ they shall go out from one fire, and another fire shall devour them; ^j and ye shall know that I am the LORD, when I set my face against them.

 8 And ^k I will make the land desolate, because they have ^l committed a trespass, saith the Lord God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—5. Ezekiel, and his companions, seem not to have been easily satisfied about the predicted judgments on their city and nation, which they had been used to consider as holiness to the Lord. He was therefore graciously pleased to represent to them the propriety of these dispensations by an apt similitude; which would also counteract the presumptuous hopes of the people. The Church and nation of Israel had often been compared to a vine; (Marg. Ref.) Now a vine is most valuable if it be fruitful; otherwise it is almost as unightly and worthless as a branable: other fruit-trees may be of some use for timber: but the vine is of no value except for its fruit. "What is the vine tree more than another tree, or even than a branch of the trees of the forest?" Wood could not be taken from it for any work; not even for a pin, or peg to hang a vessel on. Only some parts of other trees are used for fuel: but the ends and the middle, the whole of the vine when cut down, as well as the prunings of it from year to year, are consigned to the fire, and nobody attempts to reserve any part of it for other uses. And if it be useless, before it be cast into the fire, what can it be good for when almost consumed?
 V. 6—8. The nation of Israel, of which the inhabitants of Jerusalem were the chief, was, in respect of other nations, as the vine in respect of the trees of the forest. Other nations were renowned for arts and arms, and became eminent and formidable, and the Lord used them in his providence as he saw good: but Israel was his vine, from which he looked for the fruits of spiritual worship and holy obedience. They, however, proved unfruitful, or brought forth poisonous berries like the wild vine. He would therefore at present make no use of them, except as fuel to the fire of his indignation, that his justice might be glorified in their punishment. By the ruin of the ten tribes, and the preceding judgments executed upon Judah, both ends of the vine were already burned, and the Lord meant not to preserve the middle. He had set his face against Jerusalem and Judah, as an adversary; and the people would be consumed by one calamity after another, till the land should be utterly desolated.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The condescension of God to the infirmity of his servants, in satisfying them of the equity and propriety of his dealings with sinners, is very great. Men are very prone to value themselves on those distinctions and advantages, which, not being productive of suitable effects upon their hearts and lives, render them doubly criminal. Unholy professors of the truth, and hypocritical worshippers of God, are, in his judgment, the refuse of the human species; for they dishonour his name more than other sinners do, and will be rendered by him proportionably contemptible. No eminency in other endowments can avail them any thing; for fruitfulness in good works is the proper excellency of a professed Christian: and indeed, in all other things the Church hath generally been eclipsed by the people of the world. When the worshippers of God therefore do not glorify him, adorn the Gospel, and serve their generation, by their holy lives, they are condemned as refuse wood, as thorns and briers, and prove as dry fuel to the flames: and when the Lord sets his face against them, they will go from one fire to another, till they be consumed. Let us then beware of an unfruitful profession: let us come to Christ and abide in him, and seek to have his words abide in us: then shall we bring forth much fruit, glorify God, and be approved as true disciples of the Lord Jesus; whilst the unfruitful branches will be broken off, gathered together, and cast into the fire.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 2. Ezekiel prophesied in Chaldea: but his predictions chiefly related to the Jews in their own land, and tended to corroborate those of Jeremiah ; and Jeremiah, whilst he prophesied at Jerusalem, sent messages to the captives. Thus the two prophets assisted each other, by this apparent interference with one another's work. In the foregoing chapter, the conduct of God towards the Jews had been justified, by showing that they were an unfruitful vine ; yet this was not the worst ; the horrible crimes committed by them, merited the severest punishments. But pride and self-flattery rendered the people blind to all the abominations which filled Jerusalem : these the prophet was to represent to them by a parable, that they might see themselves as in a glass, and discover what manner of persons they were.

V. 3—5. The subsequent allegory or parable, immediately related to the nation of Israel ; but as that was the visible Church of God and a type of his true people, it has generally been accommodated to the case of individual believers ; yet, unless this be done with great caution, we shall draw very wrong conclusions from it. For every one must perceive the absurdity of supposing, that true believers, after conversion, actually run into all the enormous wickedness here described, so as to exceed in every abomination the worst enemies of religion. The prophet was commanded to remind Jerusalem of her base and mean original. It is evident, that the allegory at first relates to the whole nation of Israel ; though afterwards a distinction is made between Jerusalem and Samaria. Jerusalem, though afterwards the holy city, was originally built by the Canaanites, and generally inhabited by the Jebusites, (who were descended from Canaan.) (Gen. x. 15, 16.) till David took it. Yet Jerusalem's birth and nativity of the land of Canaan refers rather to the inhabitants than to the city itself. Abraham and Sarah, the ancestors of Israel, had originally been idolaters, as the Hittites and Amorites were : and their posterity, when they had expelled these nations, and possessed their land, seemed to be their descendants, as resembling them in character and conduct.— 'Thou boastest to be the seed of Abraham ; but thou art degenerate, and followest the abominations of the wicked Canaanites, as children do the manners of their fathers.'—The nativity of Israel, as a distinct people, may be dated from the time when the family of Jacob was multiplied into a nation. But at this period, they were reduced to abject slavery, and cruelly oppressed ; they drudged in the brick-kilns, and were covered with the clay ; their male-children were ordered to be slain or exposed ; they were apparently deserted of God, and in general forgetful of him, and polluted with the idolatries, superstitions, and vices of their oppressors. Thus the new-born nation, (so to speak,) was like an infant, that was cruelly cast out and exposed, (according to the barbarous custom of ancient times) that had none to wash, cleanse, clothe, or do any thing for it ; but was left, as unprovided and loathed, to perish in the day on which it was born. This was an apt representation of the wretched and perilous condition of Israel in Egypt, and it is also a striking emblem of our original state of sin and misery.

V. 6—8. Whilst this perishing infant lay defiled and trampled on in its blood, a loathsome as well a miserable object, the Lord passed by, beheld it with compassion, and said to it, "Live." Nothing in the character of Israel deserved his favour or attracted his esteem ; but every thing was suited to excite his abhorrence and to merit his indignation : yet from mere compassion and good will he preserved the nation. He spake with power ; and by his word he restrained the rage of their Egyptian oppressors, and at length redeemed Israel from bondage. By his blessing they had multiplied exceedingly in Egypt : at length they were brought forth with an outstretched arm, and formed into a powerful nation under rulers and princes of their own. The Lord also adorned them, by giving them

V. 15—22. Adultery in every case has always been deemed a very heinous offence: but it would have been peculiarly aggravated in a woman, who had been favoured and advanced in the manner above described. Thus idolatry in others might be deemed spiritual fornication; but in Israel it was adultery; a violation of the marriage-covenant, accompanied with the basest ingratitude, and evidencing a most depraved state of the heart; inexpressibly dishonourable to God, when the basest idols were deliberately preferred before him; a provocation of his jealousy; a forfeiture of all the privileges of the nation, and an introduction to every other kind of wickedness. The sacred writers in general use this allusion, because of the similarity of principles from which idolatry and adultery originate; because both of them are extremely infamous and hateful; and perhaps because idolatry and lewdness commonly went together. But this prophet spake of it in an indignant manner peculiar to himself; and he exposed Israel's infamy in language taken from the conduct of the most shameless prostitutes, and suited to mark their crimes most loathsome and detestable. The wretched outcast, having been advanced, enriched, adorned, and prospered by her espousals to God, instead of making a suitable return for such singular favours, grew proud of her beauty; and, confiding in her attractions, courted the admiration of other lovers, committed adultery with them, and soon became a common prostitute. That is, Israel became proud of their numbers, strength, riches, reputation, and privileges; and thus departed from God, made alliances with the heathen nations, and worshipped their idols. This was in some measure the case, from the time of the golden calf in the wilderness, through their successive generations: but it became more so in the latter years of Solomon, and afterwards when Jeroboam established ido-latriy in the Kingdom of the ten tribes, and under the idolatrous kings of Judah till the captivity. The adulteress also took the garments that her husband had provided for her, and with them formed and adorned splendid tents, in which to meet her paramours: that is, Israel spent their wealth and abundance in building and decorating idol-temples, and maintaining the idolatrous worship at them. This the Lord abhorred as base beyond example, and he determined to put an end to it; as the jealous husband refuses to support the extravagance of his wife, who spends his substance in entertaining her paramours. They had also formed their gold and silver into graven images: and though these were of various forms, both male and female, yet they are here represented as images of men, with whom the adulteress committed lewdness: and she even preferred these lifeless images to the company of her husband; that is, Israel preferred the worship of dead idols to that of the living God. Not only did they lavish all the productions of Canaan in the service of idols; but they burned their children in the fire to Molech, who were also the children of the covenant, and devoted to the Lord in circumcision: as if a woman should not only waste her husband's wealth on her lovers, but should murder the children she had borne to him, in order to gratify them! And could such conduct be deemed a small matter, an excusable misdemeanor? But in all these abominable idolatries, they had not remembered the low and defiled condition from which God had delivered them, nor any of the favours that he had bestowed on them.

Pass through. 'The word signifies also to dedicate. (Ez. xiii. 12, marg.) The Jews, instead of dedicating their first born to God, as the law required, offered them up as sacrifices to the devil, that was worshipped in their idols.' (Lomth.)

V. 23—29. This adulterous wife is represented, as having less and less reserve in her licentiousness: after all her former adulteries, for which a dreadful wo was pronounced on her, she builded for herself an eminent place, or a brothel, as well as made high places in every street of Jerusalem. This may refer to the conduct of Manasseh and other kings of Judah, who made the temple itself the scene of their open and abominable idolatries, in addition to all their other idol temples! Thus at length their relation to God, and the temple itself, tend'd to render them more odious and despicable; as even libertines despise women who are shameless in their conduct. Allured by the prosperity of the Egyptians, they connected themselves with them, and joined in their multiplied and abominable idolatries, for which they were noted above other nations. And though the Lord frequently corrected Israel for their crimes, by wars, famines, and other judgments; delivering them into the hands of their enemies; (as men confine, and treat harshly their adulterous wives;) though he especially punished them by the Philistines, who are represented as ashamed of the enormous idolatry of the Jews, though idolaters themselves: yet, instead of being amended by it, they formed alliances with the Assyrians and worshipp'd their gods: yea, they followed every idol that was worshipp'd by the several nations betwixt Canaan and Chaldea; and still they were not satisfied, but sought out new objects of their abominable idolatry. * Thou hast defiled thyself with the idolatries of the heathen, beginning with those practised by the former inhabitants of Canaan, and by degrees learning new species of idolatry from distant countries, such as Chaldea. (Lonth.)

V. 30—34. The powers of the soul should restrain and govern all the inferior inclinations; so that strong and ungovernable lusts prove a weak and inactive mind. How weak then must be the heart of this adulteress, who was enslaved to her lusts, and copied the most abandoned prostitutes; and who yet acted with imperiousness, disdain'd authority or control, and was as much under the power of pride as of sensuality! How senseless and irresolute must Israel be, who preferred a rabble of dunghill deities to the living God! who scorn'd his merciful authority, and yet were proud of their abused privileges! In one respect this harlot differed from others; she did not commit wickedness for hire; which, though a base motive, implies some palliation of guilt, especially when sharp necessity urges: but she was a wife, who abounded in all things; and yet, from mere licentiousness and aversion to her husband, she prostituted herself to the basest strangers, and lavish'd his wealth in hiring them to come to her: that is, Israel always prospered when they adhered to the worship of the Lord; but were always impoverished and enslaved when they forsook God, and ran into idolatry: and the alliances that they formed with the neighbouring nations, (which made way for worshipping idols) were expensive at the time, and ruinous in the event.

V. 35—43. The adulteress having been arraigned, and her guilt undeniably proved, the Judge proceeded to denounce sentence. For the enormous idolatries, cruelty, and persecution of Jerusalem and Judah, the Lord had determined to gather the surrounding nations, (both those with whom they had formed alliances, as the Egyptians and Assyrians; and such as had always been inimical to them, as Edom, Ammon, Moab, and Philistia,) to inflict or to witness, his judgments upon them. Before them he resolved to expose the crimes of the Jews, to strip them of all their privileges, and to put them to shame and contempt: as if a woman should be stripped naked, and publicly exposed; a punishment in some places inflicted on profligate women. Thus would he condemn them, as women used to be condemned for adultery, and for murdering their children: and he would execute the sentence with jealous indignation. He would give Jerusalem into the hand of the Chaldeans, who would throw down the city and temple which the Jews had polluted by idolatry; who would level their cities and high places with the ground; and who would slay, plunder, and enslave the people; and drive the remnant of them as naked captives before them. Thus they would serve Jerusalem as men used to deal with adulteresses, whom they stoned, slew with a sword, or otherwise put to death: they would burn all her palaces and edifices with fire, and make her an example to other cities and nations; as the death of an adulteress warned other women not to copy her crimes. Then would the fury of the Lord rest on Jerusalem: in this manner he would terminate her idolatries, and disable the Jews from building or endowing any more idol-temples: so should his justice be satisfied, and his jealousy subside; and having executed his purposes of vengeance, he would be quiet, and cease from his indignation. This intimates, that after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Lord would yet have mercy on the remnant of the nation. He would, however, certainly execute his vengeance upon them, for their ingratitude, because they had grieved and provoked their Benefactor by their crimes, and in order to destroy idolatry from among them. The old translation renders this perhaps more exactly,—“I have also brought thy way upon thine head; yet thou hast not had consideration of all thy abominations.” “I have punished thy faults; yet thou wouldst not repent.” The punishment of the adulteress, by stoning her, and thrusting her through with a sword, as compared with the subsequent intimations of mercy in reserve for her, keeps continually before the mind the meaning of the allegory, as relating to a collective body through succeeding generations; at some times exposed to divine judgments sweeping away vast numbers, and at other times the residue brought to repentance, and visited in mercy. So that, in expounding the chapter, it is very difficult to keep the allegory, and the thing signified by it, so distinct as it might be desired.

V. 44—47. They who framed or used sententious sayings, would make a proverb concerning Jerusalem, or apply an old proverb to her, and would say, “As is the mother, so is her daughter;” intimating that the Jews were just such a people as the Hittites and Amorites whom they had supplanted had been: (3.) The Canaanites had early apostatized from the God of their fathers, and were among the first idolaters after the deluge: they had loathed and abhorred the worship of the Lord, and had burned their children in the fire to their idols. Though they had not been solemnly espoused to the Lord, as Israel was; yet he might, in some sense, be called their husband, especially when they first renounced his worship to follow their idols: and the Jews had copied exactly their conduct, in apostacy from God, idolatry, and cruelty to their children. Jerusalem had also copied the example of Samaria, called here her elder sister; because the kingdom of Israel was larger than that of Judah; and because Israel had led the way in open apostacy and idolatry, which Judah had followed. Nay, Jerusalem proved her relation to Sodom itself, which had been an inferior city and state, to the east of Jerusalem; for the Jews had copied the abominations of Sodom, and the other cities that had been destroyed with her. Nor must Jerusalem take umbrage at 48 As I live, saith the Lord God, ^a Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters.

49 Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, ^b pride, ^c fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness was in her, and in her daughters, ^d neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy.

50 And they were haughty, ^e and committed abomination before me : ^f therefore I took them away as I saw good.

51 Neither hath ^g Samaria committed half of thy sins ; but thou hast multiplied thine abominations more than they, and hast ^h justified thy sisters in all thine abominations which thou hast done.

52 Thou also, ⁱ which hast judged thy sisters, ^j bear thine own shame, for thy sins that thou hast committed more abominable than they : ^k they are more righteous than thou : yea, be thou confounded also, and bear thy shame, in that thou hast justified thy sisters.

53 When I shall ^m bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of thy captives ⁿ in the midst of them :

54 That ^o thou mayest bear thine own shame, and mayest be confounded in all that thou hast done, ^p in that thou art a comfort unto them.

55 When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate, and Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate, ^q then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate.

56 For thy sister Sodom ^r was ^s not mentioned by thy mouth in the day of thy ^t pride.

57 Before ^u thy wickedness was discovered, as at the time of thy ^v reproach of the daughters of ^w Syria, and all that are round about her, ^x the daughters of the Philistines, which ^y despise thee round about.

being considered as of the same family with Samaria and Sodom; seeing she thought it a small matter to imitate their crimes: but had improved upon them and exceeded them, as ambitious of pre-eminence and distinction in wickedness. The daughters of Samaria and Sodom, signify the cities and towns dependent on them. ' Samaria lay northward of Jerusalem, and Sodom southward, which two quarters of the world are expressed by ^z left and right, being placed in such a position to those ^{aa} that set their faces eastward.' (Lonth.)

V. 48—51. The Lord here confirmed it with a solemn oath, for fuller assurance that the sins of Sodom were not equal to those of Jerusalem. Being situated in a very fruitful country, the inhabitants of Sodom and the adjacent cities, grew proud of their wealth and prosperity, indulged in luxury and sensuality, and attended to nothing but present gratification, for which they had abundant leisure, not being constrained to labour for their bread. At the same time they neglected to protect and uphold the poor and needy, and probably their rulers oppressed and enslaved them. In short, they were proud and ungodly, and given up to unnatural lusts: and the Lord took them away by a tremendous judgment as he saw good. But they had not sinned against such clear light and abundant advantages, or with so many aggravations, as Jerusalem had done. Nor yet had Samaria stood it out against so many warnings and mercies, or multiplied idols, or persisted in idolatry in opposition to the efforts of many pious reforming kings, as Jerusalem had done. So that the conduct of the Jews tended to justify, or by comparison extenuate, the guilt of both Sodom and Samaria. 'Pride and luxury make men ^{ab} expensive in their own way of living, and regardless of ^{ac} the wants and miseries of others.' 'The ingratitude of ^{ad} Jerusalem was greater than that of Samaria; because ^{ae} God had placed his name there. She profaned the temple, by placing idols in it; which was a degree of idolatry beyond any thing that the ten tribes had been guilty of.' (Lonth.) It is highly worthy of notice, that want of charity to the poor should be mentioned among the crimes, which brought tremendous judgments on abandoned Sodom.

V. 52—55. The Jews had perhaps proudly judged and condemned the Samaritans and Sodomites, as justly punished: and yet their own conduct tended to justify them; for they had followed and far exceeded their abominations. As these two ruined cities had been more righteous than Jerusalem, could that city expect to escape the punishment due to her enormous crimes? Multitudes of the Jews would therefore be as dreadfully destroyed as the Sodomites had been; others would be dispersed and lost among the Gentiles, as the Israelites. Many of the Israelites would return with the Jews after the captivity; and many of the Jews would bear their shame by continuing in their dispersions. As they had kept the inhabitants of Sodom and Samaria in countenance by their crimes, and thus been a comfort to them: so Jerusalem should never be reinstated in her former glory, nor the Jews be wholly restored from their captivity, until Sodom and Samaria were restored likewise. This may mean, that they never would be thus restored: but it rather relates to the conversion of the Gentiles, who are frequently spoken of by the name of some nation, that was most given up to idolatry. Then, and not before, should the captivity of Judah be fully restored. This took place in part in the apostolical age: but its most signal accomplishment is yet future.

V. 56-59. Either the Jews entirely overlooked the example set before them in the desolations of Sodom; or, being proud of their privileges and prosperity, they would have disdained to mention so infamous a place, especially as standing in any near relation to them. This was peculiarly the case, before the iniquity of the Jews was discovered, by the punishments inflicted on them, during the invasions of the land by the Syrians and Philistines in the reign of Abaz: but at that time the Gentiles reproached and despised the Jews, as a most abominable people. These, and other judgments had come upon them for their idolatries, of which they had openly borne the shame: but the Lord meant farther to deal with them after their deserts, especially in violating their covenant-engagements, which they had so solemnly ratified, but now despised as of no value or obligation.

V. 60-63. The Lord did not, however, intend finally to cast off the whole people of Israel. Of his mere mercy and abundant grace, he would remember his covenant with Abraham and Israel, and even that made with the nation at mount Sinai; and he would establish with them a better and more enduring covenant. If this at all refer to the return of the Jews from Babylon; no doubt it more directly predicts the conversion of Jews and Gentiles to Christ, and their future restoration to the Church, when the fullness of the Gentiles also shall come in. At these periods, the Jews would remember, and be ashamed of their former evil ways; they would willingly receive into communion with them the worst of the heathen, when converted to Christ; the Lord would then give unto Jerusalem for daughters, those very persons whom she had disdained to acknowledge as sisters; that is, the Gentile converts would be brought into God's family, as the children of his ancient Church. This would not be effected by the national covenant made with Israel; but by the new covenant of grace in the hands of Christ our Mediator; a covenant established upon better promises, and they would then indeed know the Lord. All these events would concur in humbling them for their sins; and they would then remember all their shameful behaviour to their merciful God; which would cover them with confusion, and silence their boasts of being the peculiar and exclusive favourites of heaven; their complaints of the Lord's dealings with them; their self-justification, and their revilings and contemptuous abuse of the poor Gentiles. When the Lord had shown himself reconciled to them, they would scarcely be able to forgive themselves, and would only have their mouths open before him in humble confessions and fervent prayers, praises, and thanksgivings. This seems particularly to refer to the case of the Jews, at their future conversion to their long rejected Messiah; when their former enmity will effectually silence their proud boastings: but it may be applied to new converts, to returning backsliders, and to true believers, who are thus instructed and disciplined by their daily experience. The conclusion of this remarkable chapter clearly predicts the abolition of the Sinai-covenant, the introduction of a new dispensation, and the union of Jews and Gentiles in the Church of Christ; events, against which the Jews, in the time of our Lord and his apostles, entertained the most invincible prejudices. "They erred, not knowing the Scriptures."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

N. B. The peculiar arrangement of these Practical Observations, renders it impossible to divide them according to the verses of the chapter; the distinct subjects therefore are only separated by a break.

As men are with great difficulty made sensible of their heinous guilt, and as this conviction is absolutely necessary to repentance and faith in Christ: so it is the duty of ministers frequently to set before them their sins, with all the aggravations of them, as the appointed means of this humiliation. None are with more difficulty convinced of their abominations than hypocrites; nor should any be reproved and exposed with so great severity and abhorrence. Human depravity is most evident in the wickedness of those who have been most favoured with the means of becoming holy, and in the similarity, hitherto very observable betwixt the visible Church and the rest of the world; except as the former hath produced the most monstrous abominations! Jerusalem hath too generally appeared to be the daughter of the Amorite and the Hitite, and the sister of Samaria and Sodom. If we could survey the Christian Church, in all the various forms and places in which it hath been established in different ages, we should have a picture before us not much more attractive than this of the nation of Israel: though there hath always been, in both of them, "a remnant according to the election of “grace,” whose pious and quiet lives have not been much noticed in history. Otherwise, the annals of the Church are the most melancholy subject that can be contemplated. Let us turn our thoughts to the first establishment of Christianity in the Gentile world, and especially in the Roman empire. The state of the Gentiles was indeed such as rendered them a loathsome object in the eyes of a holy God; yet in a time of pity and love he passed by, and said to them, as they lay perishing in sin and pollution, “Live, yea, he said unto them, Live.” He planted his Gospel among them, and caused Christians to multiply exceedingly. At length the Roman emperors becoming Christians, the Church grew great and honourable; Christianity became the established religion; abundance of liberty and encouragement was given to its preachers and professors; the places for public worship were multiplied, decorated, and enriched by ample donations and endowments, and the Church prospered into a kingdom. But what were the consequences? The pride, ambition, rapacity, and licentiousness; the furious contests and cruel persecutions; the superstitions, blasphemies, impostures, and idolatries, which came in, and continued to increase for ages, at length rendered the Christian Roman empire a genuine daughter of the Pagan Roman empire; and all that used proverbs might well say, “As was the mother so is the daughter.” Nor was there ever a heathen city or kingdom on the face of the earth, whose iniquities, cruelties, and unnatural lusts, whose whoredom and adultery, corporal and spiritual, have not been justified, and far exceeded, by the Church of Rome, and her dependencies, which long formed so large a part of Christendom, as to give occasion to her assuming the arrogant title of the Holy Catholic Church!

If we turn our attention to the reformed and protestant Churches, which were brought forth out of this anti-christian community, in a low, feeble, and despised condition, (as Israel was out of Egypt:) we shall again find cause of lamentation and shame. When they were ready to be overwhelmed in infancy by the merciless power of their enemies, and seemed to have no helper; when they were still polluted with many of the errors and superstitions of that Church, from which they had separated, as well as with other corruptions; the Lord in a time of love looked upon them, and said to them, Live: he rescued them from their oppressors, increased them abundantly, reduced them to some regular order, afforded them abundant means of grace, took them under his protection, espoused them to himself, and they became his. And he continued to purify, instruct, prosper, and adorn them with eminent and excellent ministers and writers, until they became very “renowned among the nations, through the comeliness “which the Lord had put upon them.” But though they have not run into the gross outward idolatries and enormities of the church of Rome; yet they have become proud of their beauty, and have played the harlot. In many places, forms, creeds, and establishments, are nearly the whole of what is left of their former excellency; and this dead carcass they idolize: in others infidelity and skepticism have discarded even the forms of truth and godliness. In covetousness, pride, luxury, and every worldly lust, they have grievously been guilty of idolatry: in impiety, perjury, and licentiousness, many of them have vied with Rome herself; and though more free from the blood of persecution, yet the blood shed by unjust wars and cruel oppressions in different parts of the globe, from a sordid love of gain, renders the daughter too much like her base and abominable mother. It is not necessary to expatiate further on the painful topic: the inference is obvious and unavoidable: no outward forms can change the propensity of man's heart to depart from God and rebel against him; but they often give it occasion to rage more vehemently. Whatever nation professing Christianity, whatever sect of Christians, we accurately survey, we shall soon perceive traces of the same spirit which led Israel into all their abominations.

Again, if we consider the subject with reference to ourselves, we shall here too find it applicable. When we recollect the mercies of God our Creator in giving us our being and rational powers; in protecting us in helpless infancy and bringing us to maturity; in supplying all our wants, and vouchsafing us innumerable benefits; we cannot but remember, at the same time, that we have been forgetful of him, and ungrateful and rebellious in numberless instances. How have we abused his bounty, in making provision for our pride and lusts! How have many of us proceeded from one iniquity to another, as we had time and opportunity! How have we stood it out against warnings, corrections, and convictions, and gone on in sin, though evidently exposed by it to manifold losses, troubles, and sorrows! And should we not have still continued in the same course, through our idolatrous attachment to worldly objects, and our aversion to the spiritual service of God, if we had been left to ourselves? Should we not indeed have done still worse, if our restraints had been removed, and we could have gratified our inclinations without fear or shame? Many have been educated amidst good instructions and edifying examples, and for a time have made some profession of religion; yet the lusts of their hearts have broken through all these obstacles, and hurried them away into apostacy, infidelity, and open wickedness. In various ways, the same cause produces similar effects, and it is evinced that we are all conceived and born in sin, carnally minded, and enmity against God.

And if we take a view even of true believers, we shall not fail to discover abundant evidence of the same mortifying truth. They know, that they were by nature children of wrath, even as others: they were depraved and polluted, and of the same original propensities as Amorites and Hittites. As they grew up, their innate depravity brought forth its fruit in their words and actions, and proved them to be deserving of God's indignation, and meet objects of his loathing and abhorrence. Unless He had saved them, they must have perished, without help or pity; and they had no claim on him: so that they were "cast out to the loathing of their persons, from the day " that they were born." But in a time of love and mercy, the Lord passed by them, when they lay in this polluted and perishing condition: "of his great love, wherewith he " loved them, even when they were dead in sin," he said unto them, Live, and saved them by his grace: he rescued them from the power of Satan, brought them to repentance and faith in Christ, forgave their sins, and took them into covenant with himself, and they became his people. Thus were they "washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the " name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God;" they were consecrated to him by this sacred unction; they were clothed with the robes of righteousness and salvation, enriched with the unsearchable riches of Christ, adorned with heavenly graces and privileges; and the God of Heaven became unto them both a Father and a Husband: it is his good pleasure to give them the kingdom, and they are made the excellent of the earth, "through the comeliness " which he puts upon them." Far be it from us to suppose, that many of those, who have been thus favoured and blessed, return to the habitual practice of any gross wickedness: but, alas! too often, even in them, pride and the carnal mind recover much force; they backslide from God, and pursue worthless vanities and idols. Some few have been left to fall from one evil to another, in a most awful manner, to show whither the bent of their hearts would carry them, if left to themselves, and if they should cease to watch and pray. Others have in an unguarded hour given such cause to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, as hath embittered all their future days. And even they who walk most uniformly in the Lord's ways, are conscious of such inward workings of pride and ambition; of such strong propensities to worldly objects; of such forgetfulness of God and ingratitude to him, and such rebellion against his appointments; of such unfaithfulness, unprofitableness, and want of love and zeal; of such weakness of heart and strength of passions; as render them daily more and more sensible that they equally need, and are equally unworthy of, the Lord's mercy, with the most prodigate of their neighbours. They have "the witness " in themselves" continually, that they are naturally no better than others, and that all the difference in their state, character, hopes, and prospects, arises from the mere mercy and grace of God. They look upon those who are living without God in the world, in pride, idleness, luxury, licentiousness, and cruel oppression of the poor and needy, and are humbly sensible, that it hath been the Lord's doing, that they were not left to live, die, and perish in the same manner. They look at apostates and hypocrites, at proud Pharisees and prouder infidels; and in condemning them, they condemn themselves; for such they have been, or were disposed to be. And though, through grace, they now are not such; yet they so often sin against light and love, that their conduct seems to themselves equally aggravated, even when no eye, but that of God and their enlightened consciences, can see any thing culpable. This disposes them to justify God in all his corrections, which they find to be indispensably necessary for them, and to thank him for them; and whilst they adore his justice in the final destruction of impenitent sinners, they have nothing to say in their own behalf; but feel, that, though more favoured, they are no more deserving. Thus the new convert remembers, and is confounded whilst he reviews the iniquities of his past life, and discovers the enmity of his heart against God and his word. The experienced believer is ashamed and confounded, whilst he reviews the evils of his heart and life, even since he was brought acquainted with the Gospel; and his mouth is stopped from impatient murmurs, proud boastings, severe censures, and self-justification: and the more he is satisfied that the Lord is "pacified to him for all " that he hath done," the more is he ashamed of his ingratitude and rebellion against so merciful a God and Saviour. This temper of mind distinguishes the true Christian from all other men: the Lord will bring all those to it, with whom he establishes his everlasting covenant; and will render them willing to be saved in the same way with the vilest outward offenders, and to receive them, when penitent, as their brethren in Christ Jesus. All others will have their mouths stopped in the day of judgment; and God will glorify himself, and satisfy his justice in their punishment.

But let us rejoice, that, as the Lord would not break his covenant with his ancient servants, because of all the abominations of their descendants; so he will never forsake his Church, with whom he hath made a new covenant, established upon better promises; nor will he ever leave the sinner to perish, who is humbled for his sins, and comes to trust in his mercy and grace through Jesus Christ; but will keep him by his power through faith unto salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 2. A riddle. That is, an emblematic representation, which requires attention and ingenuity to unravel it, but which aptly and elegantly depicts the transactions intended by it. This riddle seems to have been put forth about the time when Zedekiah was devising to revolt from the king of Babylon, and to form an alliance with the king of Egypt.

V. 3, 4. (11, 12.) Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, was described under the emblem of a great eagle, because of his towering ambition, and his preying on all his neighbours. The great and long wings of this eagle denoted the extent of his dominions, both in length and breadth: the feathers of divers colours signified, that he ruled over many countries abounding in people and riches, and of different languages and manners. This eagle came to Lebanon, and cropped off the highest branch of a cedar: that is, Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, and seized on Jeconiah, of the ancient and honourable family of David. And though he was the highest branch of the cedar, the heir of David's crown: yet, being very young, and newly raised to the throne, in a very enfeebled state of the kingdom, he was no more able to resist the victor, than the tender twig would be to resist the eagle. He therefore carried him and his princes to Babylon, which was become a city of merchants in a land of traffic, being very prosperous under the rule of Nebuchadnezzar. The word rendered traffic, is Canaan, which signifies trade, or merchandise. (Zech. xiv. 21. John ii. 16.)

V. 5, 6. The word, rendered a willow-tree, is translated by many, very circumspectly. Nebuchadnezzar took every precaution to prevent Zedekiah's revolting from him. (Marg. Ref.) (12, 13.) The conqueror did not further oppress or enslave the Jews, nor place over them any of his own princes: but he took Mattaniah of the family of David, Josiah's younger son, the uncle of Jeconiah; and having engaged him by covenant and by a solemn oath in the name of JEHOVAH, to be faithful to him; and having changed his name to Zedekiah, which signifies the righteousness of JEHOVAH, he made him king over the Jewish nation. Thus he planted of the seed of the land in a fruitful field, as a willow flourishes when planted by great waters. And though the kingdom was depressed and dependent; yet Zedekiah's situation was so favourable, and the conditions granted him so moderate, that by keeping of the covenant, it might have stood. Indeed for a time this twig grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature; and so long as Zedekiah and his princes were willing to depend on and submit to the king of Babylon, the Jews enjoyed peace and recovered strength, and Zedekiah prospered in his kingdom and family.

V. 7, 8. The other great eagle was Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt, who was as ambitious and rapacious as Nebuchadnezzar, but not so powerful. This eagle had great wings and many feathers; but not equal to those of the other eagle. Yet the vine bent its roots, and shot its branches towards it; in order to be watered by the furrows of its plantation. Many suppose that this refers to the inundations of the Nile, and the manner in which Egypt was watered. Zedekiah planned a revolt from the king of Babylon, and entered into an alliance with the king of Egypt; either hoping to recover independence by his assistance; or preferring to be his vassal rather than Nebuchadnezzar's, as expecting greater prosperity and security under him. But he had no sufficient or even plausible reason for this conduct; being already in such a situation as would have enabled him to reign in credit, and to be useful to his people.

V. 9, 10. (15-21.) It could not be expected that the vine should prosper: the eagle that planted it would certainly root it up, destroy all its fruit, and cause all its leaves to wither, even in the spring when other trees looked green: and this would be done very easily, as a small force suffices to pull up a newly planted vine by the roots. Though it had been carefully planted and was well watered, yet it would soon wither in its place, as a tree by the blast of the unwholesome east wind.

V. 13, 14. Notes, 3-6. (Marg. Ref.)
 Mighty, &c. 'As hostages for the performance of the covenants agreed on between him and Zedekiah.' (Louth.)

—Base. Or low. It is the same word before used, (6.) A tributary kingdom dependent on the king of Babylon; and so Zedekiah was in less honourable circumstances than his predecessors. Submission, however, to Providence would have been his duty, even if he had not engaged by covenant and oath to be faithful to Nebuchadnezzar.

V. 15-21. Zedekiah and his people expected to prosper by their worldly policy; but would God permit such perfidy and perjury to go unpunished? He had given the power into Nebuchadnezzar's hand; Zedekiah had accepted the kingdom upon the terms proposed to him, and had ratified the covenant with a solemn oath: and then he hesitated not to break it, that he might form an alliance with another heathen king! And ought he to escape punishment, who did such things? or to be delivered by his base perfidy? The Lord therefore swore by himself, as the living God, (whom Zedekiah had called to witness, when he swore allegiance to the king of Babylon,) that he should die in captivity at Babylon; especially for despising his oath, and breaking his covenant. Nor should Pharaoh, whose formidable preparations threatened the destruction of the Chaldeans, do Zedekiah any good, but should rather occasion the destruction of greater numbers of the Jews; for the Lord himself would fight against them to their ruin. (xii. 13, 14.) Though Zedekiah's oath had been given to a heathen, a conqueror, and a tyrant; and many plausible reasons might have been assigned for violating it: yet God considered Zedekiah's conduct as a great sin against him, and was determined to punish him for it. What shall we then say to the maxim, that faith is not to be kept with heretics?

V. 22-24. The Lord would not, however, forget his engagements to the family of David, whilst he punished this degenerate branch of it. He would plant a tender shoot cropped from the highest branch of this high cedar. Some refer this to Zerubbabel, who ruled over the Jews after the captivity: but if he were at all meant, it could only be as a type of Christ. This plant was first at his incarnation apparently a tender one, but after his humiliation, sufferings, and death, he was exalted to the right hand of the Father, and made "Head over all things to his Church;" and thus became a Plant of renown. The high, and eminent mountain, on which he was planted, signified the Christian Church, of which mount Zion was the type. There he grows, as the living Vine, or as the stately Cedar, or both in one, and all his people are united to him, and live in him. Under the shadow and among the branches of this tree, dwell all fowl of every wing: that is, sinners of every nation, rank, and character find refuge in Christ. And all the inhabitants of the earth, and especially the rulers of it, will know the power, truth, justice, and love of God, in these events; in bringing down the kingdom of David, when it was exalted, and withering it when it flourished; and then in exalting it from its depressed state, and causing it to flourish when it

CHAP. XVIII.

God reproves the Jews for the proverb of sour grapes, 1—4. He shows his dealings with a righteous man, 5—9; with the wicked son of a righteous father, 10—13; and with the righteous son of a wicked father, 14—18. He will deal with each individual according to his character, 19—21. The wicked, if he repent, shall live, 21—23; and the righteous, if he apostatize, shall die, 24.

He shows the equity of his dealings, and the iniquity of the Jews, 25—29. He earnestly exhorts them to repent, in the prospect of being judged according to their ways, 30—32.

THE word of the LORD came unto me again, saying,

2 What ^b mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning ^b the land of Israel, saying, ^c The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge?

was withered. Or the high and green tree may refer to the kingdom of Babylon, and all those other kingdoms, which have been, and will be, destroyed, to make way for the kingdom of Christ. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The greatest exploits of mighty conquerors, when impartially represented, resemble the ravages of birds and beasts of prey; except as their power and success render them more extensively destructive, and as they alone devour their own species. But they are employed by a righteous God, to perform a part of his grand design; and till their work be done, they prosper in their enterprises. It is more desirable to be like a spreading vine of low stature which brings forth fruit, than to prosper in doing evil; and if we be planted in the courts of the Lord, if our branches turn towards him, and our roots draw nourishment from him, we shall be "like a tree planted by the rivers of waters, which bringeth forth its fruit in due season." And should we be kept poor and obscure, and live hardly by honest industry, we shall notwithstanding be more comfortable, as well as more useful, than the most successful of the ungodly. But they who depart from God, can only vary and multiply their crimes, by exchanging one carnal confidence for another: and, notwithstanding their fair prospects and sanguine hopes, they never can attain to durable prosperity. Princes and politicians are apt to trifle with solemn oaths and treaties, and to devise specious pretences for violating them: but the Lord will not hold them guiltless who thus take his name in vain: and few of them will be able to plead more plausibly for perjury and perfidy, than Zedekiah might have done; against whom these awful threatenings were denounced, for breaking his covenant with the king of Babylon, and despising the oath sworn to him. Rulers and nations seldom prosper, who commit atrocious crimes; but no man shall escape the righteous judgment of God, who dies under the unrepented guilt of such iniquity and impiety: for as sure as the Lord liveth, he will recompense them upon the sinner's head; and the sinful methods which men take of extricating themselves out of difficulties, are sure to entangle them in snares and nets, to their greater misery or ruin. Blessed be God, our Redeemer, to whom all the prophets bare witness, differs wholly from these degenerate branches of the family of David. His word is truth, his arm is power, and his heart is love. He is planted upon a high and eminent mountain, that he may be conspicuous even to the ends of the earth: he is loaded with most precious fruit; sinners of every name find refuge from the wrath to come, and from every enemy and danger, under his shadow; and believers not only partake of his precious fruits, but are also made fruitful by him: yea, many of them are "filled with all the fruits of righteousness, which are through him to the praise and glory of God the Father." May every power, however flourishing and exalted, which opposes his cause, be brought low and withered; may his kingdom be exalted and prosper; and may the whole earth behold, and be filled with, his glory. Amen, and Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2. (Note, Jer. xxxi. 29, 30.) God had declared, both in the law and by the prophets, that he would punish the sins of the fathers upon the children unto several generations. He had traced back the ruin of the ten tribes to the idolatry of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, by establishing the worship of the golden calves; and he had charged the ruin of Judah on the sins of Manasseh. This was originally intended as an additional preservative from iniquity, especially from idolatry, which was likely to descend to their posterity, and entail judgments on them: it was an argument of the Lord's patience; for he would not immediately cast off his people, upon the first forfeiture of the covenant. It referred entirely to temporal calamities; and supposed that the generation on whom divine judgments were executed, imitated or exceeded the sins of their parents. 'God expressly threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, both in the Old and New Testament, (Marg. Ref.) but this is only to be understood with respect to the temporal punishments of this world, not with respect to the eternal punishments of the next.' (Lowth.) — 'The Scripture takes notice of a certain measure of iniquity, which is filling up from one generation to another; till at last it makes a nation or family ripe for destruction. And although these persons on whom this vengeance falls, suffer no more than their own personal sins deserved; yet, because the sins of former generations, which they equal or outdo, make it time for God utterly to destroy them, the punishment due to the sins of many generations are said to fall upon them.' (Sherlock.) But

3 As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel.

4 Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die.

5 But if a man be just, and do that which is lawful and right,

6 And hath not eaten upon the mountains, neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, neither hath defiled his neighbour's wife, neither hath come near to a menstruous woman,

7 And hath not oppressed any, but hath restored to the debtor his pledge, hath spoiled none by violence, hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment;

8 He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase, that hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity, hath executed true judgment between man and man,

9 Hath walked in my statutes, and hath kept my judgments, to deal truly; he is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord God.

the Jews, being proudly disposed to justify themselves, and impiously to arraign the divine conduct, spake and acted, as if they had been free from guilt, and suffered wholly for their father's sins: whereas their abominations far exceeded those of any former generation of Israel. With a mixture therefore of profaneness and wit, they invented a proverb, which soon came into common use. This implied that wickedness indeed merited punishment, and suffering might be expected as the effect of sin; even as the teeth being set on edge was the ordinary consequence of eating sour grapes: but that it was their hard case that their fathers had enjoyed the pleasure, (such as it was) of committing sin, and they had the pain of being punished for it: as if their guilty parents had wholly escaped with impunity; and as if themselves had been entirely blameless.

V. 3, 4. In the most solemn manner, the Lord assured the people, that he would bring this proverb into entire disuse, by exposing their crimes to public view, at the time when he executed vengeance upon them. It was absurd, as well as profane, to suppose, that he would punish the innocent instead of the guilty; seeing he had, as Creator, a sovereign right and power to deal with all men as he pleased. The life or soul of one man was as much regarded by him as that of another: he had the soul of the father as absolutely at his disposal as that of the son; and he could have no motive for letting the one escape with impunity, in order to punish the other in his stead. But "the soul that sinneth it shall die." According to the law, death, temporal and eternal, is the wages of every sin: and the impenitent sinner remains under this condemnation notwithstanding the Gospel.—Some commentators explain this of the temporal death which was about to come on the wicked Jews, by sword, famine, and pestilence; and they would confine the whole chapter to these events. But it cannot be proved, that every righteous man escaped those temporal judgments, or that all who survived them were righteous: without which the whole interpretation must fall for want of a foundation, (xxi. 3, 4.) Many indeed of the pious Jews had "their lives given to them for a prey;" but even what

Jeremiah, Baruch, and others endured, in the siege and after the taking of Jerusalem, nearly equalled the external sufferings of many wicked men among them; and none of those who survived the siege, escaped captivity or exile. So that facts, in this particular, did not so fully ascertain the equality of the divine conduct towards these distinct characters, as this hypothesis requires. The miseries that the infants suffered during the siege; and the circumstances of such of them as survived and grew up in captivity, and at a great distance from the estates and comforts, which otherwise they would have inherited, demonstrate, that in temporal things the children actually did suffer for the sins of their parents, even though they did not imitate their crimes, nay, when they were themselves righteous persons. The same has always been the case as to temporal things: nor can even infidels deny the stubborn facts which prove, that the crimes of parents entail sufferings on their children. Indeed it must be allowed by men of all creeds and systems. Instead therefore of temporal dispensations being all that is intended in this remarkable chapter; it is evident that these were not at all meant, or in a very subordinate manner; for though Israel, as a nation, was under a peculiar dispensation as to temporal prosperity and adversity; yet it appears from various testimonies of the Old Testament, that individuals were not uniformly prospered or afflicted, according to their characters. (Ps. lxxiii. Eccles. ix. 1, 2.) But in the great concerns of eternity every man was, is, and will be, dealt with according as his works evince him to have been under the old covenant of works, or the new covenant of grace; which is enough for the entire justification of the divine conduct, whatever temporal calamities men endure, through the sins of others; seeing they deserve for their own sins more than all which they thus suffer; and the Lord over-rules every event for the eternal good of believers. The use of the singular number, through the whole of this argument, tends also to confirm this sentiment: as the case of individuals, and not that of the nation at large, was evidently intended.

V. 5—9. Some expositors explain these verses, as merely 18 As for his father, because he cruelly oppressed, spoiled his brother by violence, and did that which is not good among his people, lo, ^a even he shall die in his iniquity.

19 Yet say ye, ^a Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? ^b When the son hath done that which is lawful and right, ^c and hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them, he shall surely live.

20 The ^a soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not ^b bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son: ^c the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, as soon as he had it in his power: this man would by no means perish for his father's sins. If indeed he lived in a time of public calamity, he could not avoid many temporal evils; and he might perhaps suffer famine, poverty, or captivity; or, "be taken away from the evil to come:" but as a true believer, "a doer of the word, he would be blessed "in his deed," and his soul would finally be saved. (Marg. Ref.) Thus Hezekiah considered the sins of his father Ahaz; and his whole character was a perfect contrast to that of his father.

V. 19, 20. Notwithstanding this condescension of the Lord, in explaining his dealings to the people, he foresaw they would still object, that it was evident the son did bear the iniquity of the father. To this he answered, that the son who had not copied his father's sins, but had lived a godly life, should surely be saved; and that they only should perish who had themselves deserved it. "He that doeth righteously shall be graciously accepted; he that doeth evil shall receive according to the wickedness he hath committed." (Bp. Hall.) (Notes, Is. iii. 10, 11. Rom. ii. 7—11.) Let it again be observed, that the question here is not about the meritorious ground of justification, but about the Lord's dealings with the righteous and the wicked. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. In order to evince more undeniably the mercy, as well as the equity, of the Lord's dealings with his creatures, it is here further declared, that the wicked man himself, if he turned from his evil ways, would certainly be saved. (Note, iii. 18, 19.) "If that man, who hath been formerly wicked, shall now prove truly penitent, and turn from all his sins, and live holly, he shall surely live and not die." (Bp. Hall.) "He joincth the observation of the commandments with repentance; for no man can repent indeed, except he labour to keep the law." The true penitent is also a true believer; and as to the grand question of acceptance with God unto eternal life, none of his former transgressions shall be any more mentioned unto him; but in the righteousness which he hath done, as the fruit of faith and the effect of conversion, he shall surely live. How enervated does it render the passage, to explain it, that his sins should not be mentioned against him to his temporal punishment, though they might to his eternal damnation!

21 ¶ But ^a if the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, ^b and keep all my statutes, ^c and do that which is lawful and right, ^d he shall surely live, he shall not die.

22 All ^a his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him: ^b in his righteousness that he hath done he shall live.

23 Have ^a I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God; ^b and ^c not that he should return from his ways, and live?

V. 23. "Is it any pleasure to me, that men should be wicked; or that those which are now wicked men should die everlastingly? Is it not rather my desire that men should repent, and that the repentant should live? Is not this the very sum of my Gospel, which I send into the world? Do I not call, and cry, and sue to men, that they would return from their sins, and be saved?" (Bp. Hall.) This is sufficient to encourage the humble penitent and to silence the obstinate rebel: and these are condescending methods of illustrating the divine dispensations, by a reference to human affairs. The original may be rendered, "Do I greatly delight that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God; and do I not greatly delight that he should return from his ways and live?" God doth greatly delight in showing mercy to the penitent: (Marg. Ref.) he greatly approves their repentance, and takes pleasure in their happiness; but he abhors the conduct of the impenitent, and punishes them, not because he delights in their misery, but for the display of his own glory, and the general good of his universal and everlasting kingdom. The most clement and benevolent prince finds it necessary and incumbent on him, to punish with death those criminals who endanger the safety of the state and the peace and happiness of his loyal subjects: but it is a painful duty, while he feels much pleasure in the good conduct of his people, and in showing mercy, as far as it can be done with propriety. Whereas, there have been many tyrants, who have delighted in the crimes of their subjects, as giving them occasion to gratify their malignity in tortures and executions. Every dispensation of Providence, and especially the whole plan of salvation, shows that God delights in the salvation and happiness even of sinners; and that he has done all that was consistent with his own glory, to prevent the necessity, so to speak, of executing vengeance. He could doubtless convert and save all men and all devils: but he hath wise reasons for not doing it. But it must not be inferred, that he will not execute his threatenings on the impenitent: nay, the opposition between the two parts of the verse, strongly implies, that they who do not return from their evil ways, shall certainly perish. Nor can we conceive, for a moment, that the destruction of the wicked will in the least degree interrupt the perfect blessedness of the infinite God; nay, many Scriptures show, that he takes pleasure in the display of his glory by punishing obstinate rebels; though he more delighteth in mercy. Neither must this general declaration be wrested by an application to those "secret" things which belong to God, and not to us. And will not men allow God to delight in mercy unless he show mercy in all possible cases, to the exclusion of his holiness, justice, truth, and wisdom, as the moral Governor of the world? Will they not allow him to be omnipotent, because he hath not created all the worlds which possibly might have been created? May he not be allowed to be good, because he hath not absolutely excluded evil from the creation, which he doubtless could have done? All such objections are the offspring of pride, ignorance, unbelief, and enmity: and whilst vain men would be wise, they are often little aware that they are running into direct blasphemy. In respect both of temporal and eternal retributions, infinite wisdom directs, and seems, (but only seems,) to limit the exercise of divine goodness and mercy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. (Note. iii. 20, 21.) The question here is not, whether truly righteous men ever do thus apostatize. It is certain many who were thought righteous do; and dying without repentance, they must surely perish. This suffices to show the equality of the Lord's dealings with men, which is the subject of the chapter.

V. 25. Unquial, &c. The Jews rebelled against God, robbed him of his glory, and committed manifold abominations; and then they blasphemously charged the Lord with injustice in punishing them for the sins of their fathers. So that their conduct was the very reverse of the justice, truth, goodness, and mercy of the Lord's dealings with them; and they had none to blame for their miseries except themselves.

V. 26, 27. 'It is an opinion, that prevails among the Jews even till this day, that at the day of judgment a considerable number of good actions shall overbalance men's evil ones: so that they thought it a hard case for a man, who had been righteous the far greatest part of his life, if he did at last commit iniquity, that his former righteousness should avail him nothing. In opposition to this doctrine, God here declares, that a righteous man sinning and not repenting, should die in his sins, and that a wicked man, upon his repentance, should save his soul alive.' (Lowth.) Notwithstanding this plain declaration, it is obvious, that the notion, current among the Jews, is equally current among the generality of professed Christians; though directly opposite to the whole doctrine of Scripture, and even subversive of it. For, the condemnation of every transgressor by the holy law; salvation by free grace, justification by faith, through the righteousness and atonement of Christ; the necessity of regeneration, the sinfulness of all the supposed good works of the unregenerate and unbelieving; and the great and many defects of the real good works of true believers, with many other doctrines essential to Christianity, must be entirely set aside, before such a scheme of final retribution can be made so much as plausible.

V. 28. We have here, as it were, the beginning and progress of repentance. The man is "come to himself," and he considers, where he is, what he hath done, and against whom he hath offended: he considers the evil, number, and desert of his sins; what cause he hath to be humbled and alarmed; and what need he hath of repentance, conversion, forgiveness, and newness of life. In consequence he turneth from all his transgressions, and obtaineth mercy. Is not this the very same repentance which is delineated in the parable of the Prodigal Son?

CHAP. XIX.

A lamentation over the ruin of the royal

V. 20—32. The Lord having thus stated the measure of his dealings with every individual, proceeds to assure the Israelites, that he will judge each of them according to his ways: thus it is every where declared, that the Lord will judge every man, at the last day, according to his works. On this he grounds an earnest exhortation to them to repent and turn from all their transgressions; to cast them all away from them; and even “to make them a new heart and a new spirit.” This certainly implies the same thing as regeneration, and a new creation unto holiness: and though man cannot effect this change in himself by any power of his own; yet that temper, to which regeneration restores us, is required of every one by the holy law of God; and the essence of our depravity and apostasy consists in being of the contrary temper. The change is absolutely necessary to the exercise of every Christian grace, and the performance of every Christian duty. It must be effected, or iniquity will be the sinner’s ruin: the less a sinner can do of himself, the more need he has to beg of God to work it in him: ordinances and means are appointed, directions and promises are given; in order that they who desire this change, may seek it from God. This is as much man’s duty, and as proper a subject for exhortation, as faith, repentance, love to God or man, or any other spiritual service, which the carnal mind can no more perform, than effect this new creation. Indeed exhortations to the same import are found repeatedly in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) The Israelites were therefore commanded to do these things, in order that they might be led to feel their own depravity, inability, and misery; and that they might learn to value the promises of God to this effect, and plead them in prayer. (Marg. Ref.) In this sense such exhortations are similar to Christ’s command to the paralytic to take up his bed and walk: depending on his help, who gave the command, he attempted obedience, and found himself enabled to perform it. But the sinner’s inability is criminal: he might justly be left under condemnation: and when the Gospel commands all men every where to repent; and men so love their sins, and are so proud, that they will not come to him who is exalted to give repentance; they seem resolved to die, as a man, who hath taken poison and refuses the antidote. And it is the height of human presumption and impiety, for men to charge their ruin upon God, when they so criminally despise his law, and neglect the salvation of his Gospel. The prophets often exhort the Jews to an inward purity;—thereby to take them off from relying on an outward legal righteousness. By thus instructing them in a more excellent way of serving God, than the ceremonial law did directly prescribe; they prepared their minds for receiving those truths, which the Gospel would more fully discover. God promises, (xxxvi. 26.) “to give them a new heart,” &c.; “here he exhorts them to make themselves a new heart and a new spirit; which difference of expression is thus to be reconciled, family of Judah, under the emblem of young lions taken in a net to be destroyed, 1—9: and of a vine and its branches, once flourishing, but now rooted up, withered, or burnt, 10—14.

“that although “God works in us to will and to do;” and is the first Mover in our regeneration; yet we must work together with his grace; at least willingly receive it, and not quench or resist its motions.” (Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20.

It is not more natural for fallen man to commit wickedness, than it is to excuse or justify it, and to throw the blame on others. Thus men venture to charge God with injustice, rather than condemn themselves; and either deny that future vengeance awaits them, or consider themselves punished, in this and all their sufferings, for the sin of Adam: as if they had not imitated him, and broken the law of God as well as he! An acute wit is very different from heavenly wisdom; and it is often employed as a most dangerous weapon against religion, to the ruin of many, especially of the impious possessor. Detached sentences of Scripture, and instances in providence may be adduced and wrested to support the most detestable doctrine; and even truth itself may be stated in so crude and vague a manner, as apparently to favour the most erroneous inferences. The patience, goodness, and mercy of God to some men, are often perversely interpreted to be injustice to others: as if he might not show mercy to whom he would, and as he would, provided he punish none above their deservings! But the Lord will inquire of men what they mean by their infidel and impious objections and sarcasms; and at length effectually silence them. Then the most admired infidel or profligate will have done with his witty jests and scoffs, and have them turned into wailing and gnashing of teeth: and we be to them, who thus “laugh now! for they shall weep and lament.” All souls are in the hands of the great Creator and Proprietor of the universe; and he will deal with them either in perfect equity or rich mercy: nor will any perish for the sins of another, who is in no sense worthy of death for his own. Many inquiries may here be started of cases and persons, concerning which Revelation is silent; and therefore we ought to be so, or only to say, “Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?” In our own case, we know that we have sinned; and our souls must as certainly sink into perdition as our bodies must die, if the Lord should deal with us according to the tenour of his holy law. But, blessed be his name, we are under a dispensation of mercy, and are invited to come to Christ, and to accede to the covenant, of which he is the Surety. Thus sinners become righteous, and being justified by faith, they have peace with God; his “grace teacheth them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.” They learn to avoid their easily-besetting, secret, lucrative, or fashionable sins; they “do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with God.” Thus they evidence that they are justified, and may be assured that eternal life abideth in them; whether they be of Jewish or Gentile extraction; whether their parents were righteous or wicked: for "of a truth God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him." If this be our conduct and experience, let us give the glory of this salvation to him, and take the comfort of it, in this evil world and in the prospect of death and judgment. Indeed nothing else can give us solid satisfaction: for though there is great encouragement for us to "train up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" yet there is no absolute certainty, that they will not take bad courses, and run into and persist in those destructive abominations, that we have most conscientiously shunned and carefully warned them against. In this case they must expect no favour for their parents' sake; but must perish, and their blood will be upon their own heads. But on the other hand, no man need be discouraged as to his own acceptance, on account of the wickedness of his parents and progenitors; (though his constitution, estate, and temporal concerns may be impaired by it:) provided he considers and avoids their crimes, and walks in the ways of repentance, faith, and holy obedience, marked out in the sacred word. But how absurd is their conduct, who are satisfied with any superstition, idolatry, or form, or even without any religion; provided they live as their fathers did, and walk in their ways, true or false, right or wrong! In short "the tree is known by its fruits: every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire;" and the more fruitful we are in real good works, the more evidently it appears, that we are "trees of righteousness," and the planting of the Lord, that he may be glorified."

V. 21-32.

How amazing is the condescension of our God in reasoning against the objections of his rebellious creatures! And how inexcusable will they be, who yet say, or think, that his ways are unequal, when it is so plain, that his ways are equal and their ways unequal! This appears with still greater evidence, when we consider that the most wicked man on earth is not excluded from his favour and eternal life, by all his former sins, if he do not impenitently persist in them, or despair of mercy: for if he repent and believe the Gospel, and turn from all his transgressions, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive: none of his sins shall once be mentioned against him to his condemnation: but in his righteousness that he hath done, since his conversion, and by the faith and grace of the Gospel shall he live. As to that righteousness, from which many turn away, to commit all the abominations of the wicked, and to live and die in them; they will by no means be profited by it; but in their trespasses and sins will they perish, and their last state will be worse than their first. But true believers are preserved by God, and persevere in his ways; they keep Christ's commandments and continue in his love: they fear coming short or turning back; and thus they watch and pray, continue to the end, and are saved. And are not these ways of God equal? and what can reasonably be objected to them? As therefore he will shortly judge every man according to his ways; and as he hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live: let sinners be warned, and encouraged to repent, turn from and cast away all their transgressions, and seek to the Lord for a new heart and a new spirit. Without this, iniquity must be their ruin; for none will eventually be saved, except those who repent and become new creatures, and walk in newness of life; and none will perish, who thus turn to the Lord. Let them therefore turn these commandments and exhortations into prayers; let them trust in Christ for pardon and strength; and they will by him be enabled to do all things that pertain unto salvation. It is indeed more our interest, as well as more becoming us, to be employed in mourning over and confessing our sins; praying for grace and forgiveness; mortifying our pride and lusts; exercising ourselves unto godliness; and doing good to all men, as we have time and opportunity: than to be disputing about hard questions, perverting the Scriptures, excusing our iniquities, or replying against God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 2-9. The inquiry and answer must not be understood of the mother of Zedekiah, or of the other branches of Josiah's family, but of the Jewish church and nation; which is represented under the image of a hioness, because of the cruelty and oppression which generally prevailed: for the rulers and people of Judah seemed to have lost their humanity, and to have been transformed into savage beasts. The lioness lay down among lions; that is, the Jews formed alliances with the heathens, and learned their manners. Thus she brought up her whelps with lions: that is, the sons of Josiah, though descended from so good a father, yet learned from the people and princes and the surrounding nations, to be ambitious, oppressive, and rapacious, like the tyrants and conquerors of the Gentiles. When Josiah was slain, the people of the land made Jehoahaz king in his stead; and this lion's whelp, being advanced to royal authority, became a young lion, and soon learned to use his power in oppression and cruelty. But Pharaoh-necho and his allies came against him, and took him as a wild beast in a pit; and he was carried thence in chains into Egypt, where he died. And when the people saw there were no hopes of his return, they submitted to Jehoiaikim, whom Pharaoh had appointed to be king. Thus he became their young lion; and used his power for eleven years most cruelly; desolating the palaces, cities, and country, by the terror of his oppressions. (Marg. Ref.) At length he drew on him the hatred and vengeance of the king of Babylon, and the neighbouring nations; and he was taken prisoner, and ended his life miserably: so that the terror of his roaring no more disturbed the mountains of Israel. The captivity of Jeconiah, and that of Zedekiah, are not here expressly mentioned: Jeconiah reigned a very short time, and Zedekiah seems rather to have been a timid than a tyrannical prince.

V. 10-13. The Jewish nation, and their princes, are here represented under the emblem of a vine, with many branches. This expression "in thy blood" is obscure, and differently interpreted. Some say, that blood was commonly put at the roots of vines to enrich the soil, and render them more fruitful: or, "in thy quietness;" "Thy mother is like a vine, in the time of her first peaceable plantation." (Bp. Hall.) So long as Judah continued to behave peaceably, the nation flourished: nay, so long as Zedekiah and his subjects quietly submitted to Nebuchadnezzar, they enjoyed many blessings, which they forfeited by revolting. (Notes, xix.) This vine was planted by many waters, became fruitful, had many branches, and amongst them strong rods for sceptres; that is, powerful princes had reigned over them, under whom Judah appeared very considerable among the neighbouring kings and nations. But at length the Lord, in anger, had plucked it up, thrown it on the ground, and left it, with all its strong rods, to wither and be burned. That is, the strength and prosperity of the kingdom were decayed and come to nothing. The remnant of this vine was now planted in a barren and dry land: her branches were continually consumed; her princes were slain and carried away captive; and there were none left, except a succession of inexperienced, feeble, and worthless princes, who were speedily about to be entirely deprived of the throne.

V. 14. 'A destruction is risen from among themselves, even from the treachery of Zedekiah, which hath utterly destroyed the remainder of her hopes; so that now there is no more likelihood of any of the royal blood being exalted to the government.' (Bp. Hall.) 'This is a matter of present lamentation, and shall be so in after times.' (Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who associate with ungodly and abandoned persons, will soon be assimilated to them: and when professors of religion form such connexions, their children generally grow up in conformity to the worst maxims and fashions of a wicked world. Having cast off the fear of God, they often seem to be divested even of humanity, and to be transformed into savage beasts: and that most noble and royal blood, of which so many are proud, only distinguishes them, as lions' whelps, from the other beasts of prey. Advancement to authority discovers the ambition and selfishness of men's hearts: and many know no use of power, except as it enables them to catch the prey, and devour their own species. But they who are thus the plague and terror of their neighbours, may expect to be hated and terrified in their turn: they are often hunted and laid wait for like wild beasts; and as they spend their lives in mischief, they generally end them by violence. Yet men proceed in the same bloody track, without profiting by the example of their predecessors! It is, and must be for a lamentation, that pious and useful families so soon degenerate, and flourishing churches and nations are so speedily rooted up and withered. But in all these events the Lord is righteous: and his anger dries up and consumes the prosperity of the most flourishing sinners. NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. 'All the prophecies, recorded from the eighth chapter to this, probably belong to the sixth year of Jehoiachin's captivity.' (Louth. (Notes, viii. 1. xiv. 1—5.)) Many conjectures have been formed about these elders and the subject of their inquiry; but it suffices for us to know, that they were addicted to idolatry, and that their inquiry was either a mere pretence, or they vainly attempted to serve God and idols also. Therefore the Lord swore by himself, that he would not be inquired of by them. (Marg. Ref.) 'You shall not receive such an answer as you expect, but such as your hypocrisy deserves.' (Louth.)

V. 4. Some think, that the prophet attempted to plead with God in behalf of these elders, (according to the marginal translation;) but perhaps he was thus invited and required, to act as their judge, to bring them to a trial, and having proved their guilt, to denounce sentence in the name of God against them. In order to do this, he must set in order before them the abominations of their fathers, of which their own conduct was an exact copy. (Notes, xvi. xxiii. Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. The Lord's choice of Israel, to be his people, was the source of all their privileges: in consequence of this, he made himself known to them by his word and works, when they had generally forgotten him; which he did in order that they might become his worshippers and servants. He lifted up his hand to them, as was customary in solemn oaths, engaging himself to be their God, to effect their deliverance, and to bring them into Canaan; which he had, so to speak, searched out for them, as the most fertile and excellent land on earth; a type of heaven, that chosen inheritance of God's chosen people.

Lifted up, &c. 'I swear that I would be their God, which manner of oath was observed from all antiquity, where they used to lift up their hands towards the heaven, acknowledging God to be the Author of truth, and the Defender thereof, and also the Judge of the heart; wishing that he should take vengeance, if they concealed any thing which they knew to be truth.' 11 And ° I gave them my statutes, and * shewed them my judgments, ° which if a man do, he shall even live in them.

12 Moreover also ° I gave them my sabbaths, ° to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that ° I am the Lord that sanctify them.

13 But the house of Israel ° rebelled against me in the wilderness: they walked not in my statutes, ° and they despised 14 But ° I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, in whose sight I brought them out.

15 Yet also ° I lifted up my hand unto them in the wilderness, that I would not bring them into the land which I had given them, ° flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands;

V. 7-9. When the Lord had engaged himself to be Israel's God, and to confer every blessing on them; and whilst he was working so many miracles in their behalf: he reasonably commanded them to cast away all their abominable idols, which they looked up to and worshipped; and especially those of the Egyptians their oppressors, who could not defend their devotees against the power of JEHOVAH the God of Israel. But even there, the Israelites rebelled against him, and gave to their idols: insomuch that he saw reason to say that he would pour out his fury on them in the land of Egypt; that is, he justly might, and certainly would, have destroyed them with the Egyptians, if he had dealt with them according to their deserts. But having called "Israel his son, and his first-born," and having undertaken his deliverance; the Egyptians would have imputed it to his want of power if he had not effected it; they would have concluded, that he was not the only true and living God, and have been hardened in idolatry and blasphemy. Therefore, for the glory of his own name, and to make his perfections known among the Egyptians and the surrounding nations, he spared Israel, and delivered him with his mighty hand and out-stretched arm. The honour of his truth and mercy were also concerned, and required, that he should perform his promises made to their fathers.

V. 11. Gave. 'A favour not afforded to other nations — such a treasure as David prizes above thousands of gold and silver.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

—If a man, &c. (Note, Lev. xviii. 5.) The moral law showed Israel the extent of their duty to God and man; and proved their need of mercy and grace, as well as served for the rule of their conduct; the ceremonial law shadowed forth Christ, their Righteousness and Sanctification. They who properly attended to these judgments and statutes of the Lord, in a humble, believing, and conscientious obedience, would live in them, according to the covenant of grace: and a national observance of these laws and statutes would have ensured Israel's prosperity in Canaan. Yet the manner in which St. Paul quotes this expression, (Rom. x. 5. Gal. iii. 12.) implies, that it was intended to show the Jews, that righteousness could not be obtained by the works of the law: and this well suited the argument in this place; as it served to mark the contrariety between the holy law, the rule of obedience, and Israel's rebellious conduct. So that evidently they had no claim either to temporal advantages or eternal life, by the law to which they trusted; as those blessings could only be claimed by such as had done according to the commandments, and not by those that had violated them all. (Note, Rom. ii. 13, 17-29.) 'If we understand the condition in its rigorous sense, as implying an exact and unsinning obedience, and as the word life contains the promise of eternal life under it; as it was impossible to be performed, so no person could lay claim to eternal life by virtue of any promise therein contained; from whence St. Paul infers the necessity of seeking to Christ and laying hold of the premises of the Gospel, for the obtaining justification and eternal life.' (Louth.) The promises in the Old Testament, of pardon, acceptance, and sanctification, and, in a word, of spiritual blessings, belong to the Gospel, as much as those in the New Testament. (2 Cor. i. 20. Heb. vi. 17, 18. viii. 10-12. xi. 13.)

V. 12. The Lord, as a special favour, gave Israel his sabbaths; (which included the holy rest of the weekly sabbaths, and also that of the solemnities and sabbatical years.) These were signs of their special relation to him, as his people: for at those stated times they met him with their worship, and he engaged to meet them with his blessings. They likewise marked and kept up the distinction and separation betwixt them and the Gentiles; and served to bring them more acquainted with God, his perfections, truth, and holy will: so that they were appointed means of sanctification to their souls.

V. 13, 14. (Marg. Ref.) The people in the wilderness were continually rebelling against God: they seemed to think his service a mean and irksome employment. They preferred the worship of the golden calf, and the idols of Egypt and Moab, to his statutes, which were too spiritual to suit their carnal hearts. They also profaned greatly his sabbaths; neglecting the duties of those holy days, and employing them in worldly avocations, or in secret idolatry and wickedness. So that regard to his own glory alone, prevented him from utterly extirpating them in the wilderness.

V. 15. The Lord swore in his wrath, that none of that generation, that had despised the promised land and attempted to return into Egypt, should enter into his rest: but that they should all wander, and die, in the wilderness, except Caleb and Joshua. (Notes, Num. xiv.)

V. 16. Heart. They still had a hankering after the idolatries they had learned in Egypt; to which they added new idols, viz. the idols of the Midianites, Amorites, &c. (Louth.)

V. 17. The Lord spared the rising generation, that his promises to their fathers might be fulfilled to them; whilst his wrath was poured out on those that were grown up. His purposes respecting the nation were similar in the time of Ezekiel: he was determined to destroy multitudes by his awful judgments, and to drive them all out of the land of Canaan: but he meant to preserve a remnant, whose children should again inherit the land; and to them he would fulfil his promises, especially that of the Messiah, who would be raised up among them.

V. 18. Whereby the Holy Ghost confuteth them that say they will follow the religion and example of their fathers, and not measure their doings by God's word, whether they be approveable thereby or not. (Marg. Ref)

V. 21, 22. Even that generation of Israel, which grew up in the wilderness, and lived in the midst of miracles both of judgment and mercy, was frequently rebellious against the Lord, as it appears by the history of their conduct, and by the reproofs given them by Moses. It is, however, evident, that they were much improved by the instructions and judgments of God; and that the generation that entered Canaan, was the best which there ever was of that favoured nation: and indeed the language concerning them, in this passage, is by no means so emphatical as that used concerning their fathers, (13.) Yet God might have justly destroyed them all, (as he did numbers in the matter of Baal-peor;) and he certainly would, had not a regard to his own glory among the surrounding nations, and to the honour of his own truth and grace, influenced him still to spare and bless them.

V. 23. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. Deut. xxviii. xxxiii.) The predictions of the dispersion of the Israelites, which were delivered by Moses just before his death, are evidently here referred to. They had a partial accomplishment in the Babylonish captivity; but they are far more exactly fulfilling at this day.

V. 25, 26. God in a just judgment for their disobedience to his own laws, gave them up to a reprobate mind, and suffered them to walk after the idolatrous and impious practices of the heathen. And whereas, by obeying his laws, they might have lived happily, they became slaves to the vile and cruel practices of the heathen idolatries; so as to offer up their very children in sacrifice to idols. I suffered them to pollute themselves, in those very gifts, which by the law they were to dedicate to my service, (the form Hiphil is elsewhere used in the sense of permission.) Their sin brought its own punishment along with it, destroying the hopes of families and bringing them to utter desolation. (Louth.) The first-born were by the law consecrated to God, but they devoted them to Baal or Melech. Because they would not obey my laws, I gave them up to themselves that they should obey their own fancies. It is astonishing to find, many very learned and able men contend, that the "statutes which were not good," meant the law of Moses, or some part of it; when the prophet evidently spoke of a much later time than the giving of the law;

when the context clearly explains the meaning; and when “the statutes that were not good,” are expressly contrasted with the good laws of God. The giving of the law at mount Sinai could not be intended to punish sins committed by Israel forty years afterwards; and both the moral, the ceremonial, and the judicial law, were good for their several purposes, and salutary to the people for the time being, as far as they used them properly. But God judicially left the people to be blinded by Satan, to prefer the ruinous practices of idolaters to his wise and salutary ordinances: as he is said to “send a strong delusion to believe a lie, to those who obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness.” Thus he gave them up, for their previous rebellion, to ripen for that destruction which he intended to bring upon them; that they might learn to know God by his judgments, seeing they had despised his mercies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 27. Yet, &c. Besides all the provocations of Israel in Egypt and the wilderness, the prophet was to charge on them the superstitions, idolatries, and iniquities, that they had committed in the land of Canaan. These had disparaged the perfections of God, and, as it were, blasphemed him; as if he had been less deserving of their worship than the basest idol.

V. 28. As soon as the people were settled in Canaan, where they should have applied themselves to obey the commandments of God, they began to look out for high hills, or shady groves, on which to offer their sacrifices; as more solemn or more retired; and there they presented their oblations, instead of bringing them to the court of the tabernacle; as if they had intended a provocation, rather than an acceptable service. This may be understood either of the high places, where they worshipped God in a prohibited manner, or of those where they were guilty of idolatry.

V. 29. The Lord frequently called the people to an account by his prophets, for these provocations: he inquired of them. What the high place was, to which they went up, that they should so prefer it to his temple? he exposed the very word to odium, that it might sound as offensive in the ears of his worshippers, as a brothel does in those of a virtuous woman: yet so attached were they to these high-places, throughout all their generations; that they still retained the name Bamah, or the high place, as the favourite appellation for the places where they sacrificed. What is the high place, or Bamah, which you frequent? Who bade you call it so? I named my altar Misbeach (the Hebrew word for altar;) but this place had its name from the heathen idolatry, and it still retains it. (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30—32. The Jews ought not to conclude, that they were about to suffer only for their fathers' sins; for they were polluted with the same idolatries and iniquities. Nay, the elders, that sat before the prophet, (by whom the Lord would not be inquired of,) were projecting entirely to cast off his worship, and to conform to the idolatries of the people among whom they lived; that they might obtain their favour, share their prosperity, and escape from present affliction and reproach. But the Lord solemnly assured them, that he would not prosper them in this impious attempt: their apostacy would expose them to far severer punishment, than the people would suffer that had been educated in idolatry; they would not be considered as aliens, but as traitors and deserters, who had joined the enemy, and must expect no quarter or favour.— God tells them, that he will prevent this purpose of theirs from taking effect: and we find, that from the Babylonish captivity, they have been very cautious of committing idolatry, and scrupulous of making the least approaches to it. (Louth.)

ed-out arm, and with fury poured out.

35 And ^a I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, ^b and there will I plead with you face to face.

36 Like ^a as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God.

37 And I will cause you to ^a pass under the rod, and ^a I will bring you into the bond of the covenant:

38 And ^a I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me: I will bring them forth out of the country where theysojourn, and ^a they shall not enter into the land of Israel: ^a and ye shall know that I am the LORD.

39 ¶ As for you, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord God; ^a Go ye, serve ye every one his idols, and hereafter also, if ye will not hearken unto me: ^a but pollute ye my holy name no more with your gifts, and with your idols.

40 For ^a in mine holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord God, ^a there shall all the 41 I will accept you ^a with your sweet savour, when ^a I bring you out from the people, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered; ^a and I will be sanctified in you before the heathen.

42 And ^b ye shall know that I am the LORD, ^c when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the country ^d for the which I lifted up mine hand to give it to your fathers.

43 And there ^a shall ye remember your ways, and all your doings, wherein ye have been defiled; ^a and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for all your evils that ye have committed.

44 And ye shall know that I am the LORD, ^a when I have wrought with you for my name's sake, not according to your wicked ways, nor according to your corrupt doings, O ye house of Israel, saith the Lord God.

V. 33-38. The Lord further declared, that he would assert his authority over his apostate people, by the powerful and terrible vengeance that he would inflict upon them. He would separate them from the inhabitants of those countries to which they had been driven, with whom they attempted to unite themselves: he would bring them into a situation like that of their fathers in the wilderness. There he would plead his cause with them, and make them to pass under the rod, as the shepherd does the flock, when he distinguishes betwixt the sheep and the goats, or marks out some of them for slaughter: and he would bring them into the bond of the covenant, or deal with them according to it; enforcing the bond, and exacting the penalty, as to the obstinate rebels; and again ratifying it with the penitent and obedient, and showing them mercy according to it. Thus he would destroy from among them the rebels; as he had done from among their fathers, previous to their entrance into Canaan; whom, having brought out of Egypt, he would not suffer to enter into the promised rest. The passage seems to refer to the whole of the Lord's dealings with Israel, from the time when this prophecy was delivered, to the establishment of a small remnant of them in their own land, after the captivity; from among whom the idolaters and idolatry itself were completely destroyed, by their manifold desolations, and the terrible havock made among them. These events are accommodated to the history of Israel's being brought out of Egypt, and purified in the wilderness, before they entered Canaan; though we find not any thing in history, which seems literally to answer to the prediction: but there was a great resemblance in these two distant dispensations. Many, however, suppose, that the dealings of God with the Jews, in after ages, both of judgment and mercy, are foretold.

V. 39. 'An ironical permission, full of indignation and rebuke; sharply upbraiding them for despising those many warnings which God had given them; and implying that he was resolved to give them up to strong delusions, as a just judgment for their abuse of the means of grace, so long offered to them, and still rejected by them.' (Louth.) In abhorrence and disdain of their wickedness, he bade them follow their beloved idols, and take the consequence, both at the present and in future. Let them do it at their peril, seeing they would not hearken to him: but let them no more profane and affront his name by joining him with their dunghill gods, and offering sacrifices both to him and them.

V. 40-44. 'In the Christian Church, called God's holy mountain, in allusion to the temple at Jerusalem.— The prophet expresses the Christian worship by those religious observances, which were proper to his own time: as the other prophets frequently describe the Christian Church, by representations taken from the Jewish temple and service.' (Louth.) God purposed to raise up to himself a large company of spiritual worshippers, when he had destroyed the rebels from among his people. He would restore Israel to their own land, and they would worship him on mount Zion, the eminent and honourable place which he had chosen. There would they when he gives them up to their lusts and idols; determines to receive no services from them; and says of the barren fig-trees, "Let no fruit grow on you henceforth for ever." Their condemnation then becomes irreverible, and nothing remains for them, but "a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation." In ordinary circumstances, however, none can know this to be their case. Persons of this awful character are always hardened either in presumption or despair; and whilst these alarming subjects should teach us to beware of hypocrisy, no upright inquirer need be discouraged by them; for all, who seek salvation in the Lord's way, shall certainly find it. If he had waited till some of our fallen race had merited his favour, or appeared meet objects of his complacency; nay, till any of us had been disposed to inquire after him and return to him; not one would have been saved. His free love to rebels and enemies moved him to promise and to give the great Redeemer: he mercifully sent his word to us, as he did to Israel in Egypt: he made himself known to us, when we were "enemies in our mind by wicked works;" and being thus found of us when we sought him not, he taught us to seek his favour, and an interest in his covenant mercies. Thus he became our God and Portion, and we his worshippers and servants: his word and oath became the security of our souls, and the warrant of our consolations, when we "fled for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before us;" and we then learned to expect liberty and victory, and an inheritance in that heavenly country, which he hath searched out for his chosen people. But in the day, when the Lord thus makes himself known to sinners, and, "of his great love where-with he hath loved them even when dead in sins," calls them to life and salvation; he also commands them to cast away all their idols and iniquities, and to defile themselves no more with the abominations of the ungodly world around them; that they may be his people "to show forth his praise." Yet if we look back to the important season, when we were first awakened to a sense of our guilt and danger; and remember our reluctance to part with our idolized interests, pleasures, and pursuits; and to bear the requisite cross, reproach, and self-denial: if we consider the opposition, that our hearts made to the humbling doctrines and holy precepts of God's word; or to our procrastination, and the sins which we persisted in committing against the convictions of our consciences and the strivings of the Holy Spirit: we shall be constrained to confess, that the Lord wrought with us, "for his own name's sake," and "for the glory of his grace;" or he find acceptance and oblations; he would be honoured in them among the heathen; and they would know and worship him alone, when he had gathered them from their dispersions into their own land: for they would remember their sins and abhor themselves for them, as true penitents; and they would acknowledge, that he had dealt with them in mercy and for the glory of his name, and not according to their deservings. This was fulfilled in part, by their restoration from captivity; but it seems to be a prediction of the establishment of the Christian Church: and also of the future conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 45-48. These verses are the beginning of another prophecy, and belong properly to the next chapter. The prophet was ordered to look southward, toward the land of Israel: and though he was about to prophesy against it, his word would drop as the dew or rain: for he would speak with gravity and temper, as one who sought the conversion and not the ruin of the people. (Marg. Ref.) The land of Israel, or the city of Jerusalem had been as a cultivated vineyard; but it was now become a forest, filled with unfruitful trees, abounding with beasts of prey, and about to be cut down and burned. For the Lord was determined to consume the whole forest, both green and dry trees together, that is, persons of all ranks and characters, (xxi. 3, 4.) and all the inhabitants of the land, with all their allies, would be scorched or consumed by it; and thus it would be generally known, that the Lord had kindled the fire, and that it was in vain for man to attempt to quench it.

V. 49. 'They make this an argument for disregarding what I say, that I use so many similitudes and metaphorical expressions, that they can't discover my meaning; (xiii. 9.) whereupon God commands him in the next chapter to speak the same thing in plain terms.' (Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9.

It is incumbent on ministers to charge men's sins upon their consciences, as well as to pray for them, that they may be converted and saved; when this is done in a scriptural manner, they judge and pass sentence on the wicked: and God will ratify their decisions in heaven, and produce them at the last day; except the criminals judge and condemn themselves, and seek his mercy and salvation. It is a dreadful case, when sinners provoke God to swear in his wrath, that he will no more be inquired of by them; and

CHAP. XXI.

The prophet predicting the indiscriminate slaughter made by the Lord's sword in Israel, is commanded to sigh bitterly, for a sign, 1—7. Another prophecy to the same effect, 8—17. Nebuchadnezzar in suspense, is directed by divination, to march against Jerusalem, 18—24. Sentence denounced against profane Zedekiah, 25—27. The destruction of Ammon, 28—32.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, would have left us even then to our own perverseness and rebellion, or have cut us off in his righteous indignation. For many of us are conscious, that at no moment of our lives did more of the enmity of our hearts against God and his authority and sovereignty appear, than just before he made us willing by his power, to leave all and follow Christ.

V. 10—49.

It has been repeatedly observed, that the believer, all his journey through, is conscious of many evils in his temper and conduct; and is continually constrained to confess, that he never could have escaped destruction, if God had not wrought with him for his name's sake, and not according to his own doings. He hath deserved wrath in numberless instances: and he would have turned back and perished a thousand times over, had it been possible, if he had been left to himself. He is therefore more and more disposed to remember his ways and doings, and to loathe and abhor himself, and to give the whole glory of his salvation, from first to last, to the mere mercy and distinguishing grace of God alone. And when he enters heaven, that happy land of promise, (which differs from Canaan, as rebellion, pollution, enemies, and sufferings are for ever excluded;) he is prepared to cast his crown before the throne, and praise redeeming love; and to offer spiritual sacrifices, in that holy mountain, suited to his obligations and his love of his God and Saviour.

In like manner, had not the Lord wrought for his own name's sake, his visible Church must long since have been destroyed: but his honour is concerned in its preservation, lest his name should be profaned amongst idolaters and infidels. The Lord hath given us his oracles and ordinances, his law and his Gospel, for the rule of our conduct and the foundation of our hope: and they are suited, in the proper use of them, to promote our present comfort, and to direct us in the way to everlasting life. He hath also given us his sabbaths, his own day to be kept holy, as a sign of our relation to him, our Creator and Redeemer; and that, in rendering him on it the worship due to his name, we may receive from him the sanctifying grace of his Holy Spirit, to "purify us unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works." But wherever we look, we observe multitudes that are called Christians, who do not walk in his statutes, but despise his judgments, and greatly pollute his sabbaths. For their hearts go after their idols: worldly gain, sensual or dissipated pleasure, or other carnal objects, are eagerly pursued even on the Lord's day: and if men serve the devil, the world, and the flesh on this holy day; we cannot suppose, that they serve any better Master on other days.

Alas! it is a very small remnant, even in this highly favoured land, who delight in sanctifying the day of God because they honour and love his ordinances, truths, and precepts: and this remnant are despised as precise and narrow-minded, for obeying the plain word of God, which others generally profess to believe! Thus from time to time, the Church, or different parts of it, become greatly corrupted in every respect: and the Lord gives up vast numbers to follow their own traditions, lusts, and delusions; until their very gifts and services become their greatest abominations. At length he executes his judgments upon them, as he did on Israel in the wilderness; and having by severe discipline destroyed many of the rebels from among them, and reformed the remainder, he commands them not to walk in the statutes of their fathers, but to keep his judgments and do them. Then perhaps for a time spiritual religion revives: but soon the power of godliness begins to decline, dangerous errors, abominable idolatries, or immoralities creep in; and it again becomes necessary by judgments and corrections to plead against them; again to purge out the rebels from among them, and to bring forth a company refined as gold from the furnace: or else to take away their privileges from them, and confer them on some other people.

In these ways, the Lord hath, from the beginning, wrought with his Church for his name's sake; and hath purified her from time to time, instead of utterly destroying her: and his word engages and his honour requires, that he should still have a people on earth; that the gates of hell should never prevail against his Church; and that his cause should finally prevail. But they who remain so insensible and wicked amidst the means of grace, as to cast off his worship, that they may be like the heathen to serve wood and stone, or to live without Christ and without God in the world, may be assured, that they will never prosper in such an impious project. With a mighty hand and an out-stretched arm, the Lord will assert his authority; and if idolatrous Israelites were so severely dealt with, of how much sorer punishment will apostate Christians be thought worthy! The same gracious dispensation, which ensures the salvation of every believer, denounces deeper condemnation on the unbelieving and rebellious: if the rod of the covenant do not bring men to repentance, and to walk with God according to the gracious tenour of it, he will execute upon them the punishment due to the despisers of it: and if any part of his vineyard become a forest of unfruitful trees, he will soon burn it up with unquenchable fire.—Men often deride or revile the truths of God, as if they were obscure and unintelligible: when in fact they understand so much of them, as to hate the light that condemns them. But whilst others cavil at God's word, or form projects of rebellion: it is our wisdom to humble ourselves before him, and to beg of him to glorify himself in our salvation.

11 And he hath given it to be furnished, that it may be handled: this sword is sharpened, and it is furnished, * to give it into the hand of the slayer.

David's descendants; and the sword of God's righteous vengeance would cut down Zedekiah and his family like any other of the trees of the forest. Or, It is the rod of my Son, it despiseth every tree. (Marg.) The rod of the Son of God, by which he destroys his enemies, would pay no regard to any of the trees in that devoted forest. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 6, 7, vi. 11.)
V. 13. These events would be a grievous trial of the faith and patience of God's people; or rather a trial of the Jews and their rulers, whether they would repent or not. And if the sword despired even the rod or sceptre in the hands of Zedekiah, what would be the event? Truly that sceptre would fall from his hands, the temporal kingdom in David's family would cease, and Jerusalem would be desolated. It may be rendered, "What if the sceptre "despise it?" What if Zedekiah despise these warnings and trials, and persist in rebellion? Then he shall be no more, that is, no more king of Judah. "Ezekiel, moved with compassion, thus complaineth, fearing the destruction of the kingdom, which God had confirmed to David and his posterity by promise; which promise God performed, although here it seemed to man's eye, that it "should utterly perish." (27.)

V. 14. Be doubled, &c. This is by some interpreted to signify, that the third invasion of Nebuchadnezzar would complete the ruin of Jerusalem. He had taken Jehoiakim captive, and then Jeconiah, and at the third time he would take Zedekiah, and lay the city in ruins and desolate the land. But perhaps it only refers to the repeated prophecies concerning the sword that was coming on the land. (Marg. Ref.) This sword would especially enter into the chambers of the great men, where they concealed their idolatries and iniquities; as they were the ringleaders in rebellion, and would by no means escape.

V. 15. The point of this sword, exciting terror and multiplying destruction, would appear at all the gates of Jerusalem; so that the inhabitants would have no way left to escape.

Wrapped. That it might not lose its edge or polish, till it was to be used: so some render the word sharpened. It occurs no where else in Scripture.

V. 16. The sword is here addressed, by a hold figure, as a messenger that was to go and execute his commission on every side.

V. 17. The Lord thus emphatically declared his purpose of encouraging and prospering the besiegers: till he had taken full vengeance on the Jews.

V. 19-22. The prophet was here ordered more plainly to declare, that the sword of the king of Babylon was intended by all these metaphors. He must describe on a tile, a parchment, or the ground, the road from Babylon to a place where it was parted into two roads, one leading to Jerusalem, the other to Rabbath the capital city of the Ammonites. As the people of Judah confided in the fortifications of Jerusalem, and were about to retire within them; so they were called "Judah in Jerusalem "the defended." This plan would represent the conduct of Nebuchadnezzar. For that prince would march his army from Babylon, intending to destroy both Rabbath and Jerusalem, but undetermined which he should first attack; so that when he came to the parting of the roads, neither his policy nor his resentment would decide the matter; but he had recourse to divination. This was an appeal to some superior power to determine for him: conducted with many superstitious and idolatrous rites. Three kinds of augury or divination seem to have been used on this occasion. They wrote on several arrows the names of the cities they intended to assault; and then putting them all together promiscuously in a quiver, they drew them out thence as lots are drawn; and that city whose name was writ on the arrow first drawn, was the city they first made war upon. (Jerom in Lowth.) He mingled his arrows. The teraphim, or little images that were carried with them, were consulted as oracles: some artificial answer was supposed to be returned by them: and, having offered sacrifices, the priests or augurs examined the intestines, especially the liver; from the state of which, in different animals, whether mutilated or complete, sound or unsound, or from its colour, they decided, according to the rules laid down among them. The Lord, however, so over-ruled it, that all these inquiries concurred in determining Nebuchadnezzar to march against Jerusalem, rather than Rabbath. And when this was settled, he appointed captains, and prepared every thing for the siege of that city. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. The Jews would treat these predictions as false; and disregard all the preparations of the Chaldeans, as if they were no more to be feared than their delusive divinations. They especially, who had sworn allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, (along with Zedekiah,) and had broken their oaths, and sworn others to the king of Egypt, would be so infatuated as to despise all warnings. Thus they would be delivered into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, who would remember against them their perfidy and perjury. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. Because, &c. The notorious sins of the Jews of that generation, which showed that all their doings were contaminated by impiety and iniquity, had caused the sins of their fathers also to be remembered against them, and rendered it requisite to the glory of God, that they should be delivered into the hands of their enemies. 'Because your sins cry to heaven for vengeance, ye shall fall into the hands and power of the king of Babylon.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25—27. The Lord, by his prophet, next addressed himself immediately to Zedekiah, as the head of the conspiracy against his authority. He had shown his impiety and iniquity, especially in violating his solemn oath, and revolting from the king of Babylon. But the day was come, when his crimes would meet with condign punishment; and his iniquity and that of his people, would be terminated by their ruin. The Lord had given commandment to divest him of the insignia of royal authority, and to reduce him to the condition of a blind wretched captive: when he would not appear the same person that he had been; or the authority would not be in the same hands. Jeconiah, who was then low in a prison, would again be exalted, and his family would prosper: Zedekiah, who was then on the throne, would be abased: and the Lord would overturn repeatedly the family of David and the government of Judah, till the coming of the Messiah, whose right the kingdom was, and it should be given to him for ever. This may also predict the repeated subversions of the Jewish nation by the Chaldeans, Macedonians, Romans, and many others, to the present day; which will not come to any happy termination, till they submit to their long rejected Messiah: nay, it seems to predict all the convulsions in states and kingdoms, which shall make way for the establishment of his kingdom throughout the earth. 'When the prophets speak to kings in the name of God, they lay aside those titles, and expressions of respect, which are otherwise due to regal dignity.' (1 Sam. xiii. 13. 1 Kings xviii. 18. 2 Kings iii. 13, 14.) (Lowth.)

Diadem. The Chaldee paraphrase is thus, 'Remove the mitre from Seraiach the chief priest, and I will take away the crown from Zedekiah the king.'

Overturn. 'After Zedekiah is deprived of regal authority, there shall be no more kings of that family, till Christ come.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. The Ammonites, being reprieved by Nebuchadnezzar's decision to besiege Jerusalem, were ready to promise themselves security, and to insult over the Jews. But the prophet was ordered to predict their doom also, which Nebuchadnezzar a few years after executed. 'Their reproach,' may either mean the reproach that awaited them, or their reproach of God's people.

V. 29—30. The diviners of the Ammonites encouraged them with vain predictions of victory and triumph, to trample on the Jews when suffering the punishment of their sins. It was not therefore proper, that the sword of vengeance should return into its scabbard, till they too were punished. The Lord would therefore judge and execute vengeance on them in their own land, where the nation first received its existence: (for the Ammonites seem to have increased from a family to a nation, in the same country which they then inhabited.) He would pour his vengeance on them as water: his wrath would burn against them as fire, made more vehement by being blown: he would deliver them into the hands of men, who were cruel and bloody like wild beasts, and used their understandings only for destruction. Thus he would destroy them; they would never recover their former dignity; and in process of time they would be entirely forgotten.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

Dreadful is the case of those against whom God hath set himself as an adversary! yet all impenitent sinners are exposed to this misery. Even holy places and families, that have long been eminent in religion, will have God against them, if they apostatize or greatly degenerate.—In national judgments the sword of God often cuts off both the righteous and the wicked; but not one of the righteous will be involved in the condemnation of the wicked, at the day of judgment and in the eternal world. He often “endures with much long suffering the vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction:” but when at length he draws his sword it will return no more, till it hath effected all his righteous purposes. But it behooves those who are employed to denounce the awful wrath of God against sinners, to show that they do not desire the woful day: and the example of Christ teaches us, that we ought to weep and lament over those whose ruin we foresee and declare. We should also endeavour to convince them, that we are greatly impressed with the reality, importance, and near approach of those invisible things of which we speak; and instruct them by our example, as well as by our doctrine. It scarcely seems necessary to inquire, wherefore men sigh and mourn in such a world as this: yet they who now mourn with penitent sorrow, and sympathize in the afflictions of God’s people, shall rejoice and be exceedingly glad, when all the hearts of ungodly men shall melt, and when they shall in vain call to the rocks to fall upon them and cover them from the wrath of their offended Judge. But when his sharp and glittering sword is drawn against guilty nations or individuals; and when vengeance is at the door, doth it behoove the criminals to make mirth? Would it not be more suitable to them to sigh and mourn, and even to howl and cry? at least to fast and pray, and humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, if so be he will be merciful unto them? In great national calamities his sword often disdains all the petty distinctions on which men pride themselves: the most exalted stations and sacred characters are then blended with the poor and obscure in one common ruin: except that the great are singled out as the principal criminals; and the sword often passes them into their secret recesses of wickedness, and their most secure hiding-places. Even they who fill thrones, when distinguished by profaneness and iniquity, will be exposed to shame, and their punishments made proportionably conspicuous; if they escape such revolutions, as sometimes hurry monarchs from the throne to the prison: yet death will soon terminate their career, spoil them of their diadems and sceptres, and transmit them as criminals to the judgment-seat of God.

The most self-sufficient and ungodly, as well as the most sagacious and politic, sometimes find their counsels so perplexed, as to feel the want of a superior direction: and the vain superstitious and divinations of idolaters proclaim how desirable it is to be directed by the word and Spirit of God. But whatever apparent chance or choice, whatever augury or divination, determine the measures which men adopt; the Lord secretly leads them to execute his wise designs: and even ambitious conquerors, and cruel tyrants, are the undesigning executioners of deserved punishment on condemned criminals. Wherever the sword of divine justice turns, it meets with men deserving of its stroke: but it commonly begins at the sanctuary, and first executes vengeance on those who profane it by their hypocrisy and iniquity. These are the last persons, in general, who give credit to the warnings of God’s word: their hearts are often hardened by repeatedly violating the most solemn vows and engagements, and attending on sacred ordinances in an impious and infidel manner; and they are left to themselves, till they ripen for vengeance: then their sins are made to appear, and they are brought to condign punishment. Next to such wicked professors of religion, they will be most severely punished who insult over their falls and miseries. What a frivolous advantage is it to a condemned malefactor to be executed the last of the company! How little reason has he to insult over his fellow-sufferers! yet this is the common conduct of profane men, when they see others punished whilst they are spared; though the sword will not be sheathed till it have consumed them also. But in the midst of the most tremendous predictions and denunciations of wrath, we still hear some report of mercy, and of Him through whom mercy is exercised to sinful men. All these dispensations are in the hand of the only begotten Son of God: and all wars, convulsions, and revolutions, tend to bring forward the establishment of his kingdom. The Lord will overturn, overturn, till that great revolution takes place, when "the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ." This should satisfy all who love his rightful authority, and are become his loyal subjects: "what he doeth, they know not now, but "they shall know hereafter." But let us be thankful to be employed as instruments of his mercy; let us use our understandings in devising methods of doing good; and let us stand aloof from those brutish men, who are only skilful to destroy.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 2. Jerusalem, instead of a holy city, was become "a city of bloods," filled with murder and every crime for which men were punishable by death. The prophet therefore, instead of pleading in her behalf, was summoned to sit in judgment on her: whilst the Lord himself assumed the office of an accuser and a witness, and showed that she merited the sentence of condemnation denounced against her. (Mal. iii. 5.)

V. 3—5. There is a peculiar emphasis in all these accusations brought against Jerusalem, arising from the consideration, that this was the city which God had chosen for the place of his temple, and favoured with his oracles, ordinances, special presence, and protection, above all the cities upon earth. Yet the inhabitants of this very city were peculiarly guilty of murder and idolatry, the two most atrocious of all crimes. They shed much blood in sacrificing their children to idols, persecuting God's prophets and servants, and in cruelly oppressing the poor, and by iniquitous laws and unrighteous decrees; and probably by frequent assassinations, in perpetrating robberies, and in furious quarrels. So that the people seemed in haste to bring forward the time of vengeance. They also made idols to defile themselves: which was eventually to destroy them, as it was sure to provoke the Lord to destroy them. Thus they would speedily arrive at those years of desolation, that had been predicted; when they would become the objects of scorn and reproach to the heathen: for even the idolaters, whose gods they worshipped, having tenaciously adhered to the religion of their fathers, would mock them for forsaking JEHOVAH, and insult them under the miseries that their rebellion had exposed them to; so that their iniquity would equal their misery. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—11. (Marg. Ref.)

12 In thee have they * taken gifts to shed blood; ' thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast ' greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion, ' and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God.

13 Behold, therefore ' I have smitten mine hand at ' thy dishonest gain which thou hast made, ' and at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee.

14 Can ' thine heart endure, or can thine hands be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee? ' I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it.

15 And I will ' scatter thee among the heathen, and disperse thee in the countries, and will ' consume thy filthiness out of thee.

16 And thou shalt * take thine inheritance in thyself in the sight of the heathen, and ' thou shalt know that I am the Lord.

17 ¶ And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying,

18 Son of man, ' the house of Israel is to me become dross: all they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead, in the midst of the furnace; they are even the † dross of silver.

19 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore ' I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem.

20 ‡ As they ye gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, ' to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you ' in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you.

21 Yea, I will gather you, ' and blow upon you in the fire of my wrath, ' and ye shall be melted in the midst thereof.

22 As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted in the midst thereof; and ' ye shall know that I the Lord have poured out my fury upon you.

23 ¶ And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying,

24 Son of man, say unto her, ' Thou art the land that is not cleansed, nor

V. 12. 'The judges have taken bribes, not only to pervert justice, but even to take away the lives of the 'innocent.' (Lowth).—All the immorality, as well as idolatry, of the Jews, arose from the forgetfulness of God, of his perfections, commandments, testimonies, promises, and wonderful works; and of their relations and obligations to him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. The Lord was about to show his abhorrence of the iniquity committed by his professed worshippers, and his earnestness in punishing it; as men smite their hands together, when they are provoked beyond what they are able to bear. The old translation has covetousness, instead of dishonest gain. There is nothing for dishonest in the original; and the insertion of this epithet may lead some to think, that no eagerness after gain is hateful to God, unless attended by injustice: whereas "covetousness," in all cases "is idolatry."

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.) The utter inability of sinners to stand against that God, whom they continually set at defiance, shows their folly to be equal to their impiety.

V. 15. When Jerusalem was desolated and laid in ruins, her iniquity and idolatry were entirely purged out, as by fire: and idolatry was never after practised there, till the final destruction of the city by the Romans.

V. 16. In thyself. Or, For thyself. The Lord had been the Portion of his people; and he had allotted Canaan to them for their temporal inheritance. But they had forfeited his favour, and were driven out of the country; they might therefore provide for themselves, and get what inheritance they could among the nations, by whom they were enslaved and carried captive: and thus they should know the Lord, by experiencing the misery of forfeiting his favour and incurring his indignation. (Marg. Ref.)

Thou shalt be profaned, &c. (Marg.) 'Thou shalt no longer enjoy the privileges of a city called by my name; 'but shalt be profaned by infidels.' (Lowth.)

V. 18—22. Israel, compared with other nations, had been as the gold and silver compared with the baser metals. But they were now become as the dross or scum of silver, the refuse that is consumed in the furnace, or thrown away, when the silver is refined. Or they were become as brass, tin, iron, and lead, or a mixture of such metals as are comparatively of small value. These may mean different characters among them, all far beneath what Israelites ought to have been, and at best only equal to the heathen. The Lord intended therefore to gather them into Jerusalem, as metals are cast into the furnace; to make the fire exceedingly hot under them by blowing it: and to leave them there to be melted and proved; that if there were any gold or silver, it might be separated and refined, and that the dross and base metal might be consumed. The wrath of God kindled and blew this fire, which consisted of the judgments inflicted on the Jews by the Chaldeans; by whom Jerusalem was entirely destroyed, and all orders and characters of men were either slain or reduced to a wretched captivity.—The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the long continued calamities of the Jews since that event, seem also to have been intended by the Spirit of prophecy, though the Chaldean invasion was primarily foretold.

25 There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst thereof, like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things: they have made her many widows in the midst thereof.

26 Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned mine holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they shewed difference between the unclean and the clean, and have hid their eyes from my sabbaths, and I am profaned among them.

27 Her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves ravening the prey, to shed blood, and to destroy souls, to get dishonest gain.

V. 24. No cleansing, purifying, fertilizing showers of rain, attended on these tremendous storms; the land still continued polluted with idolatry and wickedness, after all the calamities which had been experienced, and notwithstanding the predictions of more entire desolations. The people were not led to repentance or reformation, but grew more and more wicked amidst them all.

V. 25. The false prophets, who were numerous, conspired together to maintain the authority of their lying predictions, to encourage the people in wickedness, and to run down the few who spake the word of God. Perhaps they boasted of their unanimity, as a proof of the truth of their predictions: whereas it was a wicked conspiracy against the cause of God and the interests of true religion. They resembled "roaring lions ravening the prey;" they were fierce, cruel, and rapacious, seeking only to enrich themselves, and be avenged on all who opposed them. They not only deceived the souls of men by false doctrine: but they procured the death of numbers, that they might take the treasure and precious things belonging to them: thus they multiplied the widows in Jerusalem, by the murder of their husbands on one pretence or other; and reduced them to beggary, by seizing their property as forfeited.

V. 26. The whole company of the priests were become like Hophni and Phinehas: they wrested the law of God from its true meaning, that it might seem to sanction their enormities: or they contemptuously broke it for their own ungodly gain! They profaned the temple by their crimes; where the sacrifices and oblations were offered, or used by them, in a most unholy manner. They disregarded the distinction betwixt holy and profane, and betwixt clean and unclean, both in respect of times, meats, persons, and actions; making every thing bend to their interest. They connived at, and joined in, the profanation of the sabbaths; and their sacred function was so disgraced by their crimes, that the name of God was greatly profaned by them.

28 And her prophets have daubed them with untempered mortar, seeing vanity, and divining lies unto them, saying, Thus saith the Lord God, when the Lord hath not spoken.

29 The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery; and have vexed the poor and needy; yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully.

30 And I sought for a man among them that should make up the hedge, and stand in the gap before me for the land, that I should not destroy it; but I found none.

31 Therefore I poured out mine indignation upon them; I have consumed them with the fire of my wrath: their own way have I recompensed upon their heads, saith the Lord God.

V. 27, 28. The prophets employed all their ingenuity to varnish over the crimes of the princes, who were like ravening wolves, and took bribes to shed innocent blood. By these means the prophets shared the dishonest gain with the princes, or availed themselves of their authority to gratify their avarice or revenge. And thus from them robbery and oppression were diffused through the land.

V. 30. I sought, &c. Jeremiah, and some few others, endeavoured to bring the people to repentance, and to avert divine judgments by their prayers: but they were greatly despised; their efforts were generally and pertinaciously opposed, and almost entirely unsuccessful; and their prayers were discouraged. There was not one, however, that possessed authority or influence, who made a good use of it. Neither the king nor any of his nobles; neither the high priest nor any of the chief priests; nor one of the scribes, the members of the sanhedrim, or the magistrates; nor of those who possessed credit and influence. None of them all employed their abilities and authority to stop the progress of wickedness, and to bring the principal offenders to justice; or endeavoured by their labours and example to promote a reformation; or to interpose by their prayers to avert divine judgment. The Lord, (speaking after the manner of men,) sought for some Moses, Phinehas, or Samuel, to stand in the gap on this occasion: but as he found none, the destruction of Jerusalem was inevitable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16.

How strong must the stream of human depravity be, when it can burst through so many powerful obstructions, and inundate even the city of God with such a torrent of horrible wickedness! We must not excuse nor scruple to expose the crimes of men, because they live in holy places, or occupy sacred functions: for when professing Christians, or the clergy, become odious by their vices; the glory of God requires, that they should be made a reproach and a mocking even to the heathen: and if they be sheltered from deserved punishment and contempt, religion itself will be disgraced, or the sacred ministry despised; but their infamy and vexation show, that God will not connive at wickedness in persons of any name or station. It is happy for mankind, that the power of ungodly men is limited: for they who perpetrate the most injustice and murder, would do still more were it in their power. But whilst they greatly harass and afflict others, they destroy themselves. The Lord notes the sins of men with all their aggravations: and as he will call them to account for their idolatries, murders, and outrageous cruelties; so he will not overlook the neglect and contempt shown by children to their parents; the oppression of those of other religions, nations, or complexions; the vexation of orphans and widows; the slanders by which characters and often lives are destroyed; the profanation of his holy sabbaths, the neglect of his ordinances, or hypocrisy in attending on them; the preference given by men to their own traditions and superstitions, above his truths and precepts; their multiplied violations of his holy law, in the gratification of their sensual appetites, and in every species of lewdness; or their bribery, extortion, and greediness of gain, however acquired. It is very common for sinners secretly to indulge their worldly lusts; and to varnish it over with a zealous profession of religion, and a great attachment to some of its doctrines or observances: and thus they impose on themselves or on others; and perhaps exclaim against those who warn them of their danger, as precise, or over rigorous. But can "their hearts endure, or their hands be strong, in the day that God shall deal with them," as he has spoken? If in temporal judgments, every heart melts and all hands wax feeble; what will be the case "in the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God?" Will the stout-hearted, at that awful season be able to harden their hearts under misery, as they now do in impiety? Will they despise the accomplishment, as they now do the revelation of the wrath of the almighty God? As this must be impossible; let them, ere it be too late, submit to God and seek his mercy and salvation. And let those who find acute pain, or lingering disease (comparatively light and momentary afflictions,) very hard to be endured, take warning to "flee from the wrath to come," lest a far "worse thing come upon them."

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, there were ² two women, the daughters of one mother:
3 And they committed ² whoredoms in Egypt; they committed whoredoms in their youth: there were their breasts pressed, and there they bruised the teats of their virginity.

V. 17—31.

Whenever rulers and princes choose to be like ravening wolves, and to shed blood in oppression or persecution; they will be sure to find profane priests and false prophets, to buoy up their confidence and keep them in countenance! There always were men of this stamp, who would violate God's law, contradict his truths, explain away his precepts, prostitute his ordinances, see vanity, divine lies, confound all distinctions betwixt holy and unholy, daub the wall with untempered mortar; and even become caterers to the lusts, or instruments of the cruelty and iniquity of wicked rulers, for a share of the spoil, and that they might be permitted to take the treasure and the precious things. Thus they destroy both the lives and souls of men for filthy lucre's sake. By such professed ministers of religion, whose false doctrines are devised to hide the shame of their wicked lives, the Church of God becomes a den of thieves instead of a house of prayer; the gold and silver become dross and base metal; and nations are prepared to be melted or consumed by the fire of the divine indignation. And if lighter visitations be not sanctified, and rendered effectual to bring men to repentance and fruits meet for repentance; they will prove to be the forerunners of desolating judgments and irreversible destruction. But let every one, according to his measure of ability and influence, endeavour to make up the hedge and to stand in the gap, to stop the progress of iniquity, and to avert the judgments of God from our guilty land. The Lord seeks for such men, and will accept their prayers and efforts; and so long as any are found, especially among our princes, senators, magistrates, and rulers in Church or state, we may hope to be still preserved: but when none shall remain of this character, it may be expected that God will pour out his indignation upon us, and recompense our ways upon our heads, as he hath spoken. Let then, all, who fear his name, unite to promote his truth and righteousness: even as zealously as wicked men of every rank and profession often conspire to run them down.

lah ^d the elder, and Aholibah her sister; and ^e they were mine, and they bare sons and daughters. Thus were their names: *Samaria is * Aholah, and Jerusalem † Aholibah.*

5 And ^f Aholah played the harlot when she was mine; and she ^g doted on her lovers, ^h on the Assyrians her neighbours,

6 Which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers, ⁱ all of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses.

7 Thus she ^j committed her whoredoms with them, with all them that were ^k the chosen men of Assyria, and with all on whom she doted: ^l with all their idols she defiled herself.

8 Neither left she her ^m whoredoms brought from Egypt: for in her youth they lay with her, and they bruised the breasts of her virginity, and poured their whoredom upon her

9 Wherefore ⁿ I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers, into the hand of the Assyrians, upon whom she doted.

10 These ^o discovered her nakedness: ^p they took her sons and her daughters, and slew her with the sword: and she became ^q famous among women: for they had executed judgment upon her.

11 And when ^r her sister Aholibah saw this, she ^s was more corrupt in her inordinate love than she, and in her whoredoms more than † her sister in her whoredoms.

12 She doted ^t upon the Assyrians her neighbours, ^u captains and rulers clothed most gorgeously, horsemen riding upon horses, all of them desirable young men.

13 Then I saw that she was defiled, ^v that they took both one way;

14 And that she increased her whoredoms: for when she saw men ^w pourtrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans pourtrayed with ^x vermilion,

15 Girded ^y with girdles upon their loins, exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads, ^z all of them princes to look to, after the manner of the Babylonians of Chaldea, the land of their nativity:

16 And ^{aa} as soon as she saw them with her eyes, she doted upon them, ^{ab} and sent messengers unto them into Chaldea.

17 And the ^{ac} Babylonians came to her into the bed of love, and they defiled her with their whoredom, and she was polluted with them, ^{ad} and her mind was ^{ae} alienated from them

18 So she ^{af} discovered her whoredoms, and discovered her nakedness: then ^{ag} my mind was alienated from her, like as my mind was alienated from her sister.

V. 4. The kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital city, containing ten tribes, and occupying the larger part of Canaan, was called the Elder Sister in this parable. "Aholah," the name given to her, signifies, Her tent, or tabernacle; and implies, that the whole of the religion established in Israel was a human invention, a temple and service of their own, and not of God's appointment. "Aholibah," the name given to the younger sister, or to the kingdom of Judah and the city of Jerusalem, signifies, "My tent in her;" and implies that the worship established in Judah, was from God, and that his temple was indeed at Jerusalem: for the profanation of it was the grand aggravation of the sins of the Jews. Both these sisters belonged to the Lord: they were solemnly espoused to him at Mount Sinai, and bare sons and daughters to him; that is, children of God, true believers were raised up among them: and had they continued faithful to him, the whoredoms of their youth in Egypt would not have been mentioned against them.

V. 5-10. The kingdom of Israel not only revolted from the family of David, but apostatized from God, whose people they were by the most solemn engagements. In addition to their former gross idolatries, in worshipping the golden calves and Baal; in the latter times of their nation they connected themselves with the Assyrians, who became their neighbours by conquering the Syrians. They then became dotingly fond of their idols: being captivated by the comely persons and splendid appearance of the Assyrian captains and horsemen; and thinking every thing desirable, which tended to connect them with these new idolatrous allies. Thus they defiled themselves with their idols: and at the same time they retained the idolatries which they had first learned in Egypt. Wherefore the Lord at length punished them by the kings of Assyria, who turned against them, entirely spoiled their country, and slaughtered, enslaved, impoverished, and dispersed the inhabitants. Thus they executed judgment upon Samaria and Israel, and Aholah became famous or a name for her crimes and her calamities. The expression means celebrated, whether in an honourable or a dishonourable manner; either famous or infamous. She had been formerly renowned among the heathen for her beauty; (xvi. 14.) so now she was every where talked of as a remarkable instance of God's vengeance, and set forth as an example to other cities and nations, to deter them from the like abominations. (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

days of her youth, wherein she had played the harlot in the land of Egypt.

20 For she doted upon their ¶ paramours, whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue is like the issue of horses.

21 Thus thou calledst to remembrance the lewdness of thy youth, in bruising thy teats by the Egyptians for the paps of thy youth.

22 ¶ Therefore, O Aholibah, thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ¶ I will raise up thy lovers against thee, ^b from whom thy mind is alienated, ⁱ and I will bring them against thee on every side;

23 The ^k Babylonians, and all ^l the Chaldeans, ^m Pekod, and Shoa, and Koa, and all ⁿ the Assyrians with them: all of them ^o desirable young men, captains and rulers, great lords and renowned, all of them riding upon horses.

24 And they shall come against thee with chariots, wagons, and wheels, and with an assembly of people, which shall set against thee buckler, and shield, and helmet round about: ¶ and I will set judgment before them, and they shall judge them according to their judgments.

25 And ¶ I will set my jealousy against thee, and they shall deal furiously with thee: they shall take away thy nose and thine ears; and thy remnant shall fall by the sword: ¶ they shall take thy sons and thy daughters; and ¶ thy residue shall be devoured by the fire.

26 They shall also ^u strip thee out of thy clothes, and take away thy ^v fair jewels.

27 Thus ^w will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee, ^y and thy whoredom brought from the land of Egypt: so that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them, nor remember Egypt any more.

28 For thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I will deliver thee into the hand of ^z them ^z whom thou hatest, into the hand of them from whom thy mind is alienated:

V. 11—21. All the time that the kingdom of Israel was ripening for judgments, and even after it was ruined, Judah was growing more and more corrupt, and devoted to idols: and in the reign of Ahaz, afterwards in that of Manasseh and Amon, and at last after the death of Josiah, the Jews were more mad upon their idols than the Israelites had been; so that the efforts of their pious princes to reform them only tended to show the inveteracy of the disease, which increased amidst the most powerful remedies used to abate it. They too connected themselves with the Assyrians, and were enamoured of them and their idols; and then with the Chaldeans, and followed their idols: still retaining also their attachment to the Egyptians and their idols. Thus they were like those abandoned women, who have cast off all regard to decency, duty, or consequences; and are given up in the most infatuated manner to their unbridled inordinate passions, and are ready to prostitute themselves to every man they see: and their conduct was represented by these allusions, to show how loathsome and hateful idolatry is in the sight of God. But after a short time they were as much alienated from the Chaldeans, as they had been attached to them; (as is frequently the case between bad women and their paramours;) and this made way for their tempters to become their executioners. For though they were alienated from the Chaldeans, they continued to provoke the Lord by their vile idolatries and heathen alliances, especially with the Egyptians: so that he was at length entirely alienated from them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. I will set, &c. The Lord employed the Chaldeans to execute his judgments on the Jews: and they intended to judge and condemn them, for violating the solemn treaties and rebelling against them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. Nose, &c. This refers to the severe vengeance, which enraged jealous husbands sometimes took on their adulterous wives; or to the ignominious and terrible punishment that was publicly inflicted on them: and it implied that God would employ the Chaldeans to destroy the king, princes, priests, and prophets of Judah; and, as it were, first to mutilate, and then put to death, this infamous adulteress with her whole family.

V. 27. * These severe judgments shall effectually deter thee from idolatry, and make thee abhor the least approach to it. (Louth.) This prediction is frequently repeated; and the accomplishment of it has been most wonderful. It might have been expected, that a nation, ever prone to idolatry whilst in a country where the worship of the true God was established and none else tolerated, would have readily conformed to the idolatrous usages of the nations, among whom they were scattered by the captivity, and so have been incorporated with them. Yet neither the authority, the frowns, the examples, nor the favour of their conquerors or powerful neighbours; nor their own fears, hopes, interests, or predilection for the sensual jovial worship of idols, could prevail with them to run into gross idolatry, during the captivity, or afterwards! Nay, they were instrumental to the proselyting of numbers of idolaters to the worship of JEHOVAH, in the countries where they were dispersed! And though, since their national rejection of Christ, the Jews have been as destitute even of the appearance of true religion, as can well be conceived; yet they have in general been preserved from gross idolatry, during almost eighteen hundred years! The fact itself is unparalleled in the history of mankind; but it must increase the astonishment of every reflecting person, who carefully compares it with these express predictions. (Marg. Ref.)

30 I will do these things unto thee, because ^c thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen, and ^d because thou art polluted with their idols;

31 Thou hast ^e walked in the way of thy sister; therefore will I give ^f her cup unto thine hand.

32 Thus saith the Lord God; Thou shalt ^g drink of thy sister's cup deep and large: ^h thou shalt be laughed to scorn and had in derision; it containeth much.

34 Thou shalt even ^l drink it and suck it out, and thou shalt break the sherds thereof, ^m and pluck off thine own breasts: for I have spoken ⁿ it, saith the Lord God.

36 ¶ The Lord said moreover unto me: Son of man, ^r a wilt thou ^s judge ^t Aholah and Aholibah? yea, ^u declare unto them their abominations;

37 That ^v they have committed adultery, ^w and blood is in their hands, and

The word rendered Sabean, may mean drunkards, (Marg.) and it is very probable, that the drunken and mad revels, which the worshippers of Bacchus made in honour of that filthy idol adorned with chaplets and other decorations, and accompanied with music, songs, and dances of the most sensual kind, may here be referred to,

CHAP. XXIV.

The prophet is informed of the day when Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem, 1, 2. He is shown the miseries of the Jews and the destruction of the city, by the parable of a boiling pot, 3—14. He is forbidden to mourn for the sudden death of his wife ; to denote, that the calamities of the people should ex-

V. 43, 44. The Lord repeatedly warned the Jews not to enter into alliances with idolaters, nor to join their idolatres : but though they were grown hoary in these practices, and had suffered so much by them, that it might have been hoped they would have been weary of them ; yet they were as eager after them as ever !

V. 45. Richleus, &c. As upright magistrates used to condemn and execute judgment on adulteresses and murderers ; so did the prophets in the name of God denounce sentence against Jerusalem and Samaria : and even the heathen princes, who executed the sentence, were more righteous than the apostate sufferers. (Starg. Ref.)

V. 49. Bear, &c. Ye shall bear the punishment due to your idolatry. To bear sin or iniquity, is a noted expression in Scripture, signifying the undergoing of the punishment due to it. (Lowth.) This observation is of great importance, in respect of our Lord's sufferings, and the sense in which he " bare our sins in his own body on the tree."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who first draw others into wickedness will have a dreadful account to render : for when the fences of modesty, fear, and conscience are broken down, and habits of sinful indulgence are contracted, it is very difficult to reclaim the offenders. Bad customs and connexions so pollute the memory, the imagination, and the affections, and so weaken the authority of reason and conscience over the inferior inclinations ; that, even after apparent reformation, the offenders are very prone to relapse into their former practices. Every object tends to bring them to remembrance, associated with the idea of pleasure, and separated from the recollection of the painful consequences : and thus they are again tempted to return to them. When sinful imaginations are indulged, and former scenes of vice reviewed with delight, there can be no true repentance or change of heart : for, true penitents reflect with loathing and remorse on the iniquities of their former years. Whilst our ears and minds are wounded with the mention of the practices of those who work all uncleanness with greediness ; we are not generally aware, that these abominations have in them less turpitude, than our ingratitude to, and enmity against God, except as they partake of that criminality in common with more decent transgressions. If we would not be polluted with wickedness, we must avert our eyes from it, and close our senses against those objects which excite sinful thoughts and inclinations. So long as men are attracted with personal accomplishments and external embellishments, and with the pomp and pride of life, they will always be tempted to prefer worldly connexions, fashions, and maxims, to the worship and service of God, and the company of his people : and an intercourse with polished but irreligious nations always occasions an increase of vanity and iniquity. That love which is cemented by concurrence in sin, generally terminates in disgust, contempt, and enmity : and God commonly employs tempters to punish those who listen to them. When sinners will not take warning by the punishment of others, they will be made warnings themselves, to teach men not to copy their crimes. Contempt, astonishment, desolation, rage, and despair, will be the portion of the cup of all who forget God, turn their backs on him, and refuse to return : but they who are his people by profession, and by sacramental vows and engagements, and yet apostatize, will be punished most severely ; and especially such as, after having done those abominable things which God hateth, venture to go into his sanctuary and profane his ordinances, to compromise for or cloak their crimes. If the grace of God do not change men's hearts, old age will not cure them of the love of sin : nay, the filthiness of the heart often seems to increase with the decays of nature ; and worn out debauchees, like rotten wood, become more inflammable when ready to moulder into dust ! How dreadful must it be for men to enter the eternal world in such a temper of soul, and with such vile affections ! Unrepented, unmortified, unpardoned sin, must end in the destruction of body and soul, in time and to eternity : families, churches, and nations are ruined by it continually ; and all righteous men and holy angels, yea, the whole assembled world, will applaud the sentence, which at the last day the Judge shall pronounce against the workers of iniquity.

vigour, and to treat the Jews with marked severity: so that they would be wasted in the city like flesh in the boiling pot; and all their previous calamities would prepare them for a prey to the Chaldeans, as the meat is stewed, and seasoned for relishing food. For they would in this manner glut their revenge, cruelty, and avarice, as if enjoying the pleasures of a feast; and they would pursue the poor remains of the people with unrelenting rage, as men burn the bones, when they have eaten the flesh from off them. But as the pot was still polluted with the scum, or rust of the metal, (with the relics of their idolatry and iniquity,) it must also be heated, burned, and even melted by the fire, till wholly purified: that is, Jerusalem would be entirely levelled with the ground, as nothing short of this could purify it from its abominations; and then afterwards it would be rebuilt, free from those defilements, a holy city, as in former ages.

V. 12, 13. Jerusalem had wearied herself, (or wearied God,) with lies. At a great expense, and with much labour, she had followed after idols, which were lying vanities; she had sought the assistance of her heathen neighbours who deceived her; and she had professed to worship JEHOVAH, when it was mere hypocrisy. As no reformation took place, the Lord would consume her iniquity by his fiery vengeance. Her idolatry was no occasional offence, the effect of peculiar circumstances of temptation: but it was the result of a violent depraved propensity; an enmity to God and his holy worship; and a strong attachment to the sensual rites and worshippers of abominable idols: as the unfaithfulness of an adulterous wife is proved to arise from a rooted licentiousness of heart, when she grows more dissolute amidst all means used to reclaim her. The Lord had used various methods to cure the Jews of idolatry, by reforming kings, holy prophets, and awful judgments; but they still continued obstinately attached to idols: they would therefore at length be given up to ruin; and nothing further would be done for their reformation, till the Lord had caused his fury to rest upon them. (Note, Hos. iv. 16—19.)

V. 14. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16—18. This was the last message which the prophet carried to the captives, respecting the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; and it was introduced by a very afflictive dispensation to himself. The Lord informed him previously, that he would “take away the desire of his eyes with a stroke;” that is, his wife, whom he greatly loved, and whom we may suppose to have been in every respect worthy of his endeared affection, and a great comfort to him amidst his heavy trials: yet the Lord would take her from him by a sudden stroke, without any intervening sickness, which would aggravate the pain of this great affliction. Yet he was commanded to avoid every outward expression of sorrow: he was not allowed to shed tears, or to make any outcry, or to use any of the customary tokens of mourning: he was required to wear his turban, or bonnet, and his shoes, as usual; and not to cover his lips, the sign of silent distress. He was not allowed to eat the bread, which was commonly sent on such occasions to the mourners by their friends; as supposing their minds too full of perturbation to make provision for themselves; and perhaps consisting of such things as were deemed to correspond with their afflicted state, or suited to minister to their comfort. Accordingly, by the grace of God, he was enabled to acquiesce in the divine will, in this trying dispensation: and after having received this distressing information, he went to speak to the people, and to notify to them the affliction that was coming upon him, and the manner in which he was ordered to behave under it. For at even his wife died, and the next morning he was enabled openly to conform his conduct to the divine command, though it would probably expose him to the censure of being insensible, and devoid of tender affections.

V. 19—24. Some of the people would inquire the prophet's meaning, in derision or censoriousness; but others would suppose that he thus intended to fix their attention on his instructions: and their inquiry gave him an opportunity of delivering the message of God to them. He had determined to profane his temple, which had been the chief defence, distinction, and honour of their nation; and which the idolatrous Jews still presumed upon as their safeguard, and gloried in as their pride: nor could they bear to hear or think that it would ever be destroyed by the heathen. At the same time, the remainder of their children, the objects of their tenderest affection and compassion, would be slain before their eyes. And then they would imitate the prophet, when he had been bereaved of his most valuable earthly comfort: they would not show any of the ordinary tokens of sorrow; either lest they should give umbrage to the haughty victors; or because their troubles came upon them in such quick succession, that they had not space for lamenting each of them: or because their personal sorrows were swallowed up in the calamities of the nation; or the multitudes, who had cause to lament, would render particular instances of affliction less noticed; or in short, their griefs would be too big for utterance. So that in sullen and stubborn desperation, without even the relief of freely giving vent to their sorrows, they would pine away in unrepented and unpardoned iniquities, or only fretfully complain and repine one to another in private. Though this was addressed to the captives, yet it related to the general concerns of the nation. For the prophet suffered this heavy affliction, in this composed manner, to be a sign unto them of their approaching condition and conduct; when they would know the power, truth, and justice of the Lord, by the accomplishment of these terrible predictions.

V. 25—27. When the city and temple should be destroyed, all the nobles and valiant men, that were the strength, confidence, boast, and rejoicing of the Jews, should be cut off; and their valuable treasures, and still more valued children, torn from them: the Lord would send one of those who had escaped the sword, to inform the prophet. Then his mouth would be again opened to speak with him that brought the tidings, concerning the affairs of the nation: and the people would perceive by the event that he had been a sign unto them, to make them know and fear the Lord. In the mean time he would be dumb, as to the Jews, and would not deliver any prophecies to them, during the continuance of the siege; though employed to deliver several predictions concerning the neighbouring nations. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V, 1—14.

The times before appointed, for the condign punishment of ungodly men, may seem to approach slowly, but they will certainly and speedily arrive. In the mean while it behoves the ministers of God to use every method of exciting the attention and awakening the consciences, of the careless and obstinate, to a sense of their guilt and danger.—The refuges to which impenitent rebels flee for safety, are often the occasions or the scenes of their destruction.—Men weary themselves far more in the pursuit of lying vanities, either in open wickedness, or hypocrisy, or superstition, than they need to do in seeking happiness and salvation in the service of God, and in the method of the Gospel. Some sinners are longer spared than others: but unless they repent and be converted, they will all perish, without respect to rank, abilities, or reputation.—The wrath of God is sufficient to convert any place into a hell, for the torment of his obstinate enemies: even as his favour and consolations can change a dungeon into a heaven, for the benefit of his suffering servants. They who are shameless in their crimes, shall be rendered infamous in their punishment: and all the innocent blood, which ambitious warriors, cruel tyrants, oppressors, or persecutors have gloried in shedding, shall soon be required at their hands. When the instructions of God's word and the chastenings of his rod, leave men hardened in impenitence, he often condemns them "to continue filthy still;" and their filthiness will then no more be purged, till he hath caused his fury to rest upon them to their final destruction. However infidels may despise the denunciations of God's word, he will certainly accomplish them, and not go back, nor spare, nor repent; but will judge sinners according to their ways and their doings.

V. 15—27.

Marriage is honourable in all, not excepting either priests or prophets, or the most eminent servants of God: and an amiable and pious wife is justly valued and rejoiced in, as one of the chief of created comforts. Yet this honourable and endeared affection must be subordinated to the love, and submitted to the will of God. The faith which influenced Abraham to sacrifice his beloved Isaac, will cause us to submit patiently, should the Lord take away the desire of our eyes by a sudden stroke: for he hath a right to recave every loan, and is able to make up every loss to us. We cannot expect to retain very long our most valued earthly comforts; and should continually be seeking for grace, to enable us properly to bear such separating strokes: yet are we sure that our sovereign God will not take our relatives from us, without some wise and good reason. But should he see it conducive to his own glory, to our good, or the good of our brethren, to make us examples of suffering affliction and of patience: if our hearts be in a proper frame, we shall say, "Thy will be done;" and shall find his grace sufficient for us. Nature must indeed feel exquisitely: but Christians should be careful not to sorrow as men without hope, or to copy the vehement language and expressions of grief, that are in use among those who know not God: and ministers especially should always endeavour so to moderate their passions on trying occasions, that they may be instructive examples to the numbers, who have their eyes upon them. They must not deviate from their duty to follow the fashions of a vain world: nor is it expedient to omit their work on account of personal troubles; for it hath often been observed, that their words on such occasions have proved peculiarly useful to the hearers. Every dispensation of Providence, and every action of the eminent servants of God, should lead us to inquire what we may learn from them; and it is very desirable, that the conduct of ministers should excite the people to hear the word of God from them. His ordinances, and the welfare of his Church, should be dearer to our hearts than our nearest relatives: for they are the excellency of the strength, and the most honourable and joyful distinction of every nation, that truly values them. But when men abuse and pollute divine institutions by their crimes; and yet confide in the outward form, as entitling them to acceptance and protection; the Lord will take away these privileges, or pour contempt upon them. Yet after all the scriptural examples of this truth, men still continue to confide and glory in externals, who yet hate the power of godliness! But if the case of sinners, under great temporal calamities, who remain unhumiliated and desperate, and pine away in their iniquities, be very dreadful: what will be the case of those "whose worm never dieth, and whose fire is not quenched?" Blessed be God, we need not thus pine away in any of our present afflictions: for should all comforts fail and all sorrows combine against us; yet the broken heart and the mourner's prayer are always accepted before our God. Mourning before him, confessing our sins, and seeking his help and grace, we need not despond, and shall not be left comfortless, in any situation during life, or in the approaching agonies of death.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 2. 'Look thou towards the coast of the Ammonites, and in this posture do thou prophesy against them.' (Bp. Hall.) (Marg. Ref.) V. 3—7. The enmity of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites against the Jews, seems to have originated from ancient competitions, and from covetous desires of their possessions; but it was augmented by their hatred of God and of his worship. They therefore rejoiced over the profanation and destruction of the temple, as well as over the miseries of the people and the desolation of the land; and they expressed their insulting triumph in the most

8 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God; Because that ^o Moab and ^p Seir do say, Behold, ^q the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen;

9 Therefore, behold, I will open the ^r side of Moab from the cities, from his cities which are on his frontiers, from the glory of the country, ^s Beth-jeshimoth, ^t Baalmeon, and Kiriathaim,

10 Unto the men of the east [†] with the Ammonites, and will give them in possession, that the Ammonites ^u may not be remembered among the nations.

11 And ^{*} I will execute judgments ^v upon Moab; [†] and they shall know that I am the Lord

12 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God; ^a Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah, by [‡] taking vengeance, and hath greatly offended, and revenged himself upon them;

incident manner; as if they meant to encourage the Chaldeans in the work of carnage and destruction. The Lord therefore reminded them, (for it is probable, that these predictions would be sent to them or heard of by them;) that he was about to deliver them also into the hands of their enemies to be destroyed. It is likely, that Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the Ammonites some time after the destruction of Jerusalem: that the Arabians, and other nations to the east of Judah, took possession of their cities and enjoyed the fruit of their lands: and that they made Rabbah their head-quarters, and there kept their camels and folded their flocks, of which they possessed vast multitudes. The Ammonites have long since perished from being a distinct nation: and the performance of these predictions was suited to convince the survivors, that JEHOVAH was indeed the only living and true God. 'By the men of the east may be meant the Chaldeans. Ammon is reckoned among the countries which God foretold by Jeremiah, should be delivered into the hands of the king of Babylon.' (Lenth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. Judah had been distinguished from other nations, by the peculiar protection of JEHOVAH, as well as by the temple, and the worship there performed; but their idolatries had rendered them like the nations: and their calamities terminating in the destruction of their city and temple, seemed to indicate, that the Lord either could not or would not protect them any longer. Thus they appeared to be made like to the heathen; and Moab and Edom were greatly rejoiced at it.

V. 9. 'I will make a passage for his enemies to invade his frontier-cities, and from thence to possess themselves of the best of his country.' (Lenth.)

V. 10, 11. "To the sons of the east, with the sons of Ammon, I have even given it for a possession; in order that the sons of Ammon may no longer be remem-

13 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; I will also stretch out mine hand upon Edom, [†] and will cut off man and beast from it; and I will make it desolate from Teman; and they [‡] of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

14 And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom ^{*} by the hand of my people Israel: and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger, and according to my fury; and they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord God.

15 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God; ^{*} Because the Philistines have ^b dealt by revenge, and have taken vengeance with a despiteful heart, [†] to destroy it || for the old hatred;

16 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ^{} I will stretch out mine hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the [†] Cherethims, and destroy the remnant of the ^{} sea-coasts.

"bered among the nations. And I will," &c. The ruin of Moab would deprive the Ammonites of every resource, and be one means of their sinking into neglect and oblivion. Thus both Ammon and Moab, who were nearly related, and generally supported each other, would be desolated together by the same powerful enemies.

V. 12. The Lord had given the peculiar blessing to Jacob, in preference to Esau; Jacob had grievously offended Esau by his conduct in that matter; and Esau's resentment had been transmitted to his posterity. The Israelites and Jews had also obtained many advantages over the Edomites; who watched their opportunity of taking vengeance for them, when the Jews were in distress, and especially when they were crushed by the power of the Chaldeans: but in so doing they highly offended the God of Israel, and brought his terrible vengeance upon themselves. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. By the hand, &c. Judas Maccabæus, and afterwards Hyrcanus, vanquished the Edomites, and at length reduced them entirely into subjection to the Jews: and thus that revengful nation was made to know the vengeance of God, by the hand of his people Israel.

V. 15. The Philistines were a remnant of the old inhabitants of Canaan; and from the days of Joshua they had hated Israel, and had been for ages very formidable enemies: but having been at length reduced, they were not able to express their hatred, till the Jews were subdued by the Chaldeans; and then they assisted them to cut off the fugitives. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Cherethims, &c. Either the Cherethims were a tribe of the ancient Canaanites, bordering on the Philistines; or this is merely another name, by which the Philistines were known. "The remnant" seems to mean the inhabitants of Ashdod, which had been almost destroyed. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The hatred, which ungodly men bear to true religion, is so excessive, that they can rejoice in the desolations of the Church and the calamities of her children, even when ruin impends over them from the same quarter! Though God acts with perfect wisdom and justice, in permitting the profanation of his sanctuary, and the troubles of his professed worshippers, being influenced by abhorrence of their sins, and zeal for his own glory, yet their enemies are induced by far other motives, when they triumph and insult over them in such circumstances. They who rejoice at the calamities of their neighbours, out of avarice, ambition, resentment, or malignity, will be exposed to judgments for it: but they that rejoice with great delight in the afflictions of God's people, out of hatred to his truth and worship, may expect that he will stretch forth his hand against them, as his personal enemies. Gladly would such persons see the Church entirely destroyed, and made in character and circumstances like the rest of the world: but, notwithstanding all her corruptions and afflictions, a vast difference still remains, and will continue to the end of the world, and to all eternity. When rapacious men are about to seize upon the possessions of others, they often are deprived of their own: and such as disdain the afflicted will soon sink into contempt. Vengeance belongeth unto God; they who without his commission revenge themselves, greatly offend, and will be made to know his vengeance: and they who treasure up the old hatred, and watch for their opportunity of manifesting it, are "treasuring up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. It is probable that this was the first day of the first month of that year, in which Jerusalem was taken; though the month is not mentioned.
(Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The Tyrians seem not to have had any peculiar enmity against the Jewish religion or nation: but they were merchants, whose object was to extend their commerce; and they supposed that the ruin of Jerusalem would tend to their advantage; they hoped to draw to themselves the trade with those people, that had been used to frequent the gates of Jerusalem; and thus to be replenished, when she was laid waste. There was a great confluence of people to Jerusalem at the solemn feasts, as well of Jews as proselytes. When Jerusalem was taken, the spoil of the city was carried, to Tyre for sale: and probably many of the inhabitants, being made captives, were sold there for slaves, a traffic the Tyrians dealt in very much; (xxvii. 13. Joel iii. 2—6.) (Lorth.)
Thus the wicked rejoice at their fall, by whom they may have any profit?

V. 3—6. This chapter and the two following contain a very copious prophecy against Tyre, which was one of the most ancient cities in the world, and for many ages one of the most flourishing; being the centre of commerce betwixt the east and the west, and the grand emporium of the earth. Such predictions have generally been accomplished in a gradual manner: and whilst some more signal and near event was particularly foretold, they contained also expressions, which related to more remote futurity.
It had been foretold by Isaiah, that Tyre, after having been destroyed by the Chaldeans, would at length recover her prosperity, and that the Tyrians would be converted to Christianity: (Notes, &c. Isaiah xxiii.) The total and final ruin of that city could not be effected, till those prophecies had been fulfilled: yet that also was clearly predicted, and has accordingly been exactly accomplished.
We may therefore interpret these verses as a summary prediction of those events which would take place, during a long succession of ages: and thus we at this day, possess a fuller demonstration, that Ezekiel wrote by divine inspiration, than his contemporaries had; for what man could have thought of so entire a destruction of such a flourishing city, as is here predicted, and has accordingly happened? The Lord, being against Tyre, declared that he would cause many nations to come up against her. This may mean the Chaldean army, composed with troops from several nations; but it seems rather to intend the Chaldeans, Macedonians and other nations, who successively weakened, and have at length totally desolated Tyre. These would bear down all before them, like an inundation of the sea: and not only destroy her walls and towers; but even reduce the ground, on which the city stood, to a bare and barren rock, a place for the spreading of nets, like some rocks found in the midst of the sea. The spoil and trade of Tyre would also be divided among many nations; and the dependent towns and villages, in the adjacent country, would fall before her by the sword of the conquerors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9-11, (Marg. Ref.)
V. 12. A spoil, &c. Though the Tyrians had carried off their most valued treasures; so that Nebuchadrezzar, when he took the city after thirteen years' siege, was greatly disappointed as to the value of the plunder: yet there could not but be great quantities of spoil left in so rich a city. (Note, xxix. 17-20.)

V. 13. 'Great cities are full of all kinds of gaiety and luxury: this shall be turned into a melancholy silence.' (Lamth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. 'It has been commonly said, that when old Tyre was closely besieged, and was near falling into the hands of the enemy, that the Tyrians fled from thence, and built new Tyre on the island: but the learned Vitringa hath proved at large from good authorities, that New Tyre was founded several ages before, and was the station for ships.' (Bp. Newton.) It was, however, the city on the continent which Nebuchadrezzar destroyed, and this was never rebuilt. 'He rased the whole to the ground, and slew all found therein. After this it never recovered its former glory; not rising any higher than to become a village by the name of old Tyre.' 'The city on the island became the Tyre, afterwards so famous by that name.' (Prideaux.) At length Alexander the great used the ruins of the city on the continent, to make a way across the narrow sea to the city on the island, when he besieged it; and this tended to render the site of old Tyre like the top of a rock; and then her stones were cast into the midst of the water, (12.) And in process of time the city on the island was also entirely desolated.

V. 15. The isles, &c. The countries of Europe bordering on the Mediterranean, which traded with Tyre and where her colonics were established, seem here to be principally intended. They were greatly interested in her fate, which must have exceedingly affected their trade and prosperity: probably they had much wealth in the hands of the Tyrian merchants, and in the warehouses of that city, when it was destroyed; and the fall of so prosperous a city, and the miseries endured by her inhabitants, were sufficient to make all others tremble for themselves, as well as mourn over her.

by the fall of Tyre, is described in language peculiarly impressive and affecting.

V. 17, 18. Terror, &c. Though the Tyrians never made extensive conquests by land; yet they claimed the sovereignty of the seas, and often made those who frequented them tremble, by their powerful fleets and superior skill in naval affairs: but they would at length cause them to tremble by their unexpected fall.

Departure. ‘When thy people shall be carried captive.’ (Louth.) Or, when they fled from the city, and emigrated to other countries.

V. 19. Bring, &c. The destruction of Tyre is here compared to a shipwreck. (Note, xxvii. 26—36.)

V. 20. Tyre would at length be so entirely destroyed, that her prosperity would no more be remembered, than men are when they have long been dead and buried. This would be at the time “when the Lord should set glory in the land of the living:” which may either mean, the display of his glory in the fulfilment of this prediction, or in the restoration of the Jews to their own land: or it may refer to the coming of Christ, and the establishment of the Gospel. Some make Tyre a type of Rome, the New Testament-Babylon, or antichrist; at whose destruction the Lord will set glory in the land of the living, by making his cause triumphant all over the earth. (Notes, Rev. xviii—xx.)

V. 21. ‘These prophecies, like most others, were to receive their completion by degrees: Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the old city; and Alexander employed the ruins, in making his cause to the Island. It may be questioned, whether the new city ever arose to that height of power, wealth, and greatness, to which it was elevated in the times of Isaiah and Ezekiel. Alexander, by building Alexandria in Egypt, deprived it of much of its trade. It had the misfortune afterwards of changing its masters often; being sometimes in the hands of the Ptolemies kings of Egypt, and sometimes of the Seleucidæ kings of Syria; till at length it fell under the dominion of the Romans. It was taken by the Saracens about the year after Christ 639: it was retaken by the Christians, in the year 1134. From the Christians it was taken by the Mamalucks of Egypt, 1229: from them it was taken by the Turks, 1516, under whose dominion it continues at present. But, alas, how fallen, how changed, from what it was formerly! It is now become a heap of ruins, visited only by the boats of a few poor fishermen.’ (Bp. Newton on the Prophecies.) On the north side it hath an old Turkish ungarrisoned castle: besides which you see nothing here, but a mere Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c. there being not so much as one entire house left: its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches, harbouring themselves in the vaults, and subsisting chiefly upon fishing, who seem to be preserved in this place by divine Providence, as a visible argument, how God hath fulfilled his word concerning Tyre, viz. that it should be as the top of a rock, a place for fishers to dry their nets on.’ (Maudrell’s Journal.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Many maxims, current in the commercial world, are diametrically opposite to the law of God, which requires us to love our neighbour as ourselves: for the selfish love of gain influences men to rejoice in the calamities of others, even of cities and nations, that interfere with this leading object; especially if they can hope to grow rich when others are impoverished. But God will show himself to be against such mercenary selfish traders, whose hearts grow callous to every humane feeling, through the love of riches. How then must he abhor those who increase their wealth by the sweat and blood of their brethren, whom they violently enslave and cruelly oppress for this only reason? Men have little cause to glory in those precarious advantages, which excite the envy and rapacity of other covetous persons, and are continually shifting from one to another; and in getting, keeping, and spending of which, they provoke that God, whose wrath turns joyous cities into ruinous heaps. Thus his justice is displayed and his purposes effected from age to age: and none can say how soon the most powerful and wealthy resorts of commerce, may become like Tyre, a place for the spreading of nets, and a spoil to the nations. We have abundant cause for gratitude on account of that exemption from war in our land, with which we are favoured; and to pray that it may be continued to us and our posterity: for the condition of invaded countries, and besieged and plundered cities, is women recounted every thing that was valuable or praise-worthy belonging to the deceased, and then lamented his loss.

V. 3, 4. Tyre was situated upon the Mediterranean sea, and formed the nearest entrance to it from the interior of Asia. It was therefore every way conveniently placed, to unite in commerce Asia, Africa, and Europe, the whole of the known world at that time: especially it was the centre for the trade of Asia and the East Indies, with the many isles and countries of Europe. Old Tyre was built upon the sea-coast on the continent; the new city was upon an island about half a mile from the shore. In both, the builders had done their utmost to render every thing commodious, elegant, and magnificent, in the greatest degree: so that they seem to have perfected their beauty. Of these improvements in architecture, and in every thing connected with the most extensive trade and the most abundant prosperity, the Tyrians were become exceedingly proud: and they thought their city a perfect model, and superior to all others in the world. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—9. In the subsequent description of the navigation and commerce of Tyre, the critics and antiquarians have found much employment; but a few brief hints must suffice in this place. The whole is suited to give us the most enlarged idea of the wealth, luxury, and extensive commerce of this renowned city: and to render the prediction of its ruin and its accomplishment, the more affecting and instructive. The Tyrians or Phenicians for Tyre was the principal city of Phenicia,) were accounted the inventors of navigation; and it is certain, that they carried it to greater perfection than any of the ancients. We are here informed, that the planks for their shipping or the decks of their ships were of fir, brought from Shenir, or mount Hermon: their masts were made of the cedars of Lebanon; their oars, (for oars as well as sails were used in most, if not all, of the ships of the ancients,) were of the oaks of Bashan: so that the land of Israel

V. 15—21.

They who carefully study the Scriptures, will derive advantage even from the de-olations of war, through successive generations and in the most distant regions; as they will thence deduce still fuller proof of the divine inspiration of that sacred book, which is the rule of their conduct and the foundation of their hope; every discovery of a remarkable fulfillment of any scripture-prophecy, is like an evident miracle wrought before their eyes for the confirmation of their faith; and this evidence is continually accumulating upon them, in connexion with the witness "in themselves" which they enjoy in their own experience. Being thus instructed and established in the faith, we should use redoubled diligence, to obtain and possess the full assurance of our citizenship in that city, which hath immovable foundations, unalienable treasures and joys increasing and eternal, and which no enemies can destroy. All else is vanity and vexation: they, who now terrify others by their power, may soon astonish them by their fall: they, who have now the most established prosperity, will soon be as dead men, out of sight and forgotten: and the wicked will not only go down into the grave, but into the bottomless pit of destruction. But the glory of God, the preservation and prosperity of his Church, and the everlasting salvation of his people, will be promoted by the destruction of all who oppose them.

supplied the Tyrians with timber for ships, though the Israelites built but few themselves. The Tyrians were also furnished with benches of ivory, or inlaid with ivory, by the company of the Ashurites. As ivory was brought out of the interior parts of Asia; and as Chittim signifies the countries adjacent to the Mediterranean sea; it is probable, either that some Europeans imported the ivory, and sold the benches when made to the Tyrians, or that artificers came to Tyre to manufacture them. But it does not appear how the Assyrians could be said to make these benches; and the clause is rendered by some, of box-wood inlaid with ivory. See also the margin. The fine linen of Egypt, which was renowned throughout the world, and richly embroidered too, was used by the Tyrians for their sails: or rather for their flags or colours, as the original may be rendered: for it can scarcely be conceived that their sails were generally formed of such materials; though such extravagance might occasionally be used in an ostentatious display of wealth and magnificence. Their clothes, or the tents and canopies upon the decks of their galleys, were formed of cloth of blue and purple from the isles of the Egean sea, or the Grecian colonies near the coast of Asia Minor. Purple was called the Tyrian colour: yet they were not contented with their own manufactures, but luxuriously used that, which was brought from far and at a great price. They had mariners from Zidon, the mother-city and from Arvad an island in Phenicia: who did the laborious work on board their ships; whilst the Tyrians, being very skilful in navigation, acted only as pilots, or occupied the more honourable departments. The inhabitants of Gebal, a promontory in Phenicia, having been long skilful and experienced, in closing the joinings of the ships to prevent leaks, or in stopping them when made, were retained for this service: whilst ships and mariners from all nations came to Tyre to purchase their merchandise, and to dispose of their own for it. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. The Tyrians were themselves chiefly employed in navigation and commerce, and in enjoying their affluence: but it was requisite that they should have forces ready to oppose hostile assailants. They had therefore an army of men, hired from Persia, Lydia, and Lybia; whose martial appearance and armour added to the comeliness of the city. The island of Arvad furnished them with soldiers to guard their walls, as well as with mariners; and the Gammadins, who perhaps inhabited some part of Phenicia, garrisoned their towers; and their glittering shields, being hung upon the walls, made them have a still more magnificent appearance. (Marg. Ref.) The Lydians in Asia seem to have descended from Shem; but Ludim is placed among the sons of Misraim, the son of Ham: and as Lud and Phut are elsewhere named together, it is probable that some tribe in Africa is meant; perhaps the Abyssinians. The conjectures about the Gammadims are altogether unsatisfactory.

V. 12—25. We have here a particular account of the nations or cities, that traded with Tyre, and the commodities which they brought to her markets. Thus Tarshish, or Tartessus in Spain, (as it is supposed) exchanged various metals, (which were either the produce of that country or fetched from others,) for the rich luxuries of the eastern world. It is probable that the tin was brought from Britain, (out of Cornwall,) which was first known to the ancients, as yielding great quantities of that metal. The different parts of Greece, or the regions about the Euxine and Caspian seas, sold slaves, and vessels of brass to the Tyrians. Togamah, or Phrygia, Cappadocia, or some of the regions in Asia Minor, supplied them with horses and mules, and with servants skilful in managing them. The inhabitants of Dedan, supposed to be in Arabia, traded with them; and many isles or countries of Europe, bought of the Tyrians the goods which they brought them: especially their horns of ivory, or rather, horns, ivory and ebony, i. e. the horns of some curious animals, ivory which is the teeth of elephants, and ebony, a very hard and valuable wood. These they brought for a present to the Tyrians, or rather as the price of the goods which they purchased. "Many isles bought the merchandise of thy hand," &c. (15.) The Syrians bought the manufactures, which the Tyrians made in abundance, and paid for them with precious stones and other articles of luxury. The land of Judah and Israel had no precious stones or metals to exchange, (though it was the glory of all lands,) but it supplied them with what was more valuable, namely, abundance of good wheat, honey, oil, and balm used in medicine: (it is uncertain whether Pannag be the name of a place, or of some valued production of Canaan.) Damascus changed the wine of Helbon, and white wool, which were both in great repute, for the useful manufactures of Tyre. The inhabitants of Dan and Javan, (probably not the city Dan in the coasts of Israel, nor any part of Greece as before, but cities in the east,) brought polished iron or steel, with rich spices to Tyre, to exchange for the commodities of the western world: as another Dedan, (probably in Idumea,) did rich cloths to ornament or line their chariots. Some districts of Arabia supplied Tyre with cattle; others with spices, gold, and precious stones.—The inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Media, and the adjacent regions, traded with Tyre, bringing chests of all kinds of rich apparel. In short, all the ships which sailed on the sea, and which were generally called "the ships of "Tarshish," celebrated the praises of Tyre: that city was replenished with all kinds of riches, and made glorious with all earthly decorations and magnificence. Upon a review of this account of the commerce of Tyre, it is plain that that city traded with every part of the then known world, either immediately, or through the medium of other nations. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26—36. Tyre is here poetically described as a ship at sea, and wrecked through the mismanagement of her pilots and rowers. When the rulers of Tyre provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make war upon them, and when they pertinaciously resolved to withstand that haughty conqueror, they rowed this gallant ship into perilous waters; and when the city was taken, it was "broken by the east-wind in the midst of the seas." The same was the case in the time of Alexander the great, and in those subsequent disasters, which terminated in the total ruin of Tyre. Thus the inhabitants and riches of Tyre, like the crew and cargo of a broken ship, sunk into the midst of the seas. The cry of the leading men in Tyre, when they saw that the city must be taken; (like that of pilots, when they perceive that the ship must sink.) would be heard in the extreme parts of the city, or even on the adjacent continent. All the rowers and mariners of the ships that had used to trade to Tyre, would come on shore to witness the fatal catastrophe, and would express their extreme sorrow by every significant token; and with great astonishment and deep regret contrast the former prosperity of Tyre, when kings and nations were enriched by her, with her present condition, now that she was utterly broken and ruined. But whilst most kings and nations would be astonished and troubled, some merchants would triumph and insult over her, (as she had done over Jerusalem:) expecting to be replenished, now she was laid waste. The whole of this is so correspondent to the lamentation made over the fall of the New Testament-Babylon, or Rome, that we cannot but suppose, there was something typical in the fall of Tyre. (Marg. Ref.) 'The vicissitudes of time, or rather the barbarism of the Greeks of the lower empire, and the Mahometants, have accomplished this prediction. Instead of that ancient commerce, so active and so extensive. Sour, (Tyre.) reduced to a miserable village, has no other trade than the exportation of a few sacks of corn and raw cotton, nor any merchant but a single Greek factor, who scarcely makes sufficient profit to maintain his family.' (Volney.) This extract is taken from the writings of one, who published the observations which he made on the spot; and who was very far indeed from favouring the cause of revelation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25.

Whilst there are persons and books in abundance, ready to instruct us concerning the advantages of extensive commerce, about which the inhabitants of these nations are neither ignorant nor indifferent; it would be well, if more regard were paid to those Scriptures, which point out the sins and dangers, to which men are exposed by it. We should be thankful for our situation at the entrance of the seas, which renders our land as convenient a centre of modern, as Tyre was of ancient, commerce: and we possess singular advantages as an island for excluding foreign invaders, as well as for a friendly intercourse with all the nations of the earth. At the same time we should by no means forget the wisdom and goodness of the Creator, in so dispensing his liberality, that each country has its valuable productions, which it can spare to other nations: and it would be happy for mankind, if the mutual destruction of wars were more generally exchanged for the reciprocal advantages of commerce, till all nations were united in one common bond of amity and mutual utility. It is also worthy our notice, how many things of small value in themselves, are, by manufactures and commerce, rendered the means of honest industry and subsistence to many thousands. Yet commerce, beneficial as it is, hath its peculiar dangers and evils. Alas, that modern commerce, and even that of this favoured land, should have occasioned perhaps the shedding of more human blood, than the destructive wars of sanguinary conquerors! But we hope that God will ere long raise up to us a number of humane and philanthropic legislators to terminate these hateful abuses; and to establish such regulations, as shall render our commerce conducive to the happiness of the most distant nations, as well as to that of our own; otherwise, whatever profane politicians may imagine, our prosperity will soon be broken, like a ship-wrecked vessel. It is obvious likewise, that commerce tends to increase men's wants and inordinate gratifications, and their pride, self-confidence, and vain glory: as if it rendered cities and nations, perfect in beauty and sufficient for their own prosperity, independent of the providence of God. Too often men, eagerly pursuing riches, neglect justice, truth, and humanity; and deem every measure justifiable that proves lucrative, and every thing glorious that is prosperous. Yet more merchants and traders are just, generous, and benevolent, than humble, pious, and devoted to God. When riches increase, the possessors are apt to set their hearts upon them, and to forget the Lord, who alone giveth them power to get wealth: they prefer the wisdom of this world, to that which is from above: they study the ledger more than the bible: extending their trade is a far greater object in their view, than the propagation of the Gospel: religion is made subservient to worldly interest; and the maxims of the counting-house are employed in bartering for church-livings, and in managing designs, professedly intended for pious and charitable purposes. The beauty of holiness and the peculiar privileges of the children of God, have no splendour in their eyes, compared with large estates, fair houses elegantly furnished, and all the indulgence of pride and luxury, and of that avarice by which they are supported. And thus the religion, morals, and maxims of nations are corrupted and debauched: the sinews of their strength are relaxed, their policy degenerates into craft, and their counsels into mercenary sophistry.

engage in rash projects and destructive wars: and thus prosperous states are reduced and ruined; their grandeur only tends to enhance the greatness of their fall; many spectators lament over, and are astonished at their ruin; and others triumph in it and rise to prosperity, whilst they are no more. Trade is a fluctuating thing; it passed from Tyre to Alexandria, from Alexandria to Venice, from Venice to Antwerp, from Antwerp to Amsterdam and London; the English rivaling the Dutch, as the French are now rivaling both. It behooves those who are in possession of it, to take the greatest care they do not lose it. Liberty is a friend to it, as it is a friend to liberty. But the greatest enemy to both is licentiousness, which tramples on all law, encourages riots and tumults, promotes drunkenness and debauchery, sticks at nothing to supply its extravagance, practices every art of illicit gain, ruins credit, ruins trade, and will in the end ruin liberty itself. Neither kingdoms nor commonwealths, neither public companies nor private persons, can long carry on a beneficial flourishing trade, without virtue, and what virtue teacheth, sobriety, industry, frugality, modesty, honesty, punctuality, humanity, charity, the love of our country, and the fear of God. The prophets will inform us, how the Tyrians lost it; and the like causes will always produce the like effects. (Bp. Newton.) Whatever may be the case with the community, individuals may guard against these evils in themselves: and their immortal interests call them to it more forcibly than any temporal motives can do. If we be poor, we should learn to be contented with food and raiment; and having the needful provisions of Judah and Israel, we need not covet the superfluities of Tyre. They who engage in commerce, should remember that they are the servants of God, and learn to conduct their business, according to the precepts of his word, in submission to his providence, and with an aim to his glory. And they who possess wealth, should remember, that they are his stewards, and must not waste his goods, in gratifying "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or the pride of life;" but should use them in "doing good to all men, especially to the household of faith," and in promoting the Christian religion. Above all, we should be careful to "seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness," and to do and use every thing in subservency to the salvation of our souls. Then our riches will never be taken from us; and when we shall be no more on earth, we shall go to possess an incorruptible and unchangeable inheritance in heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 2-5. Ethbaal or Ithobalus, was the prince or king of Tyre at the time when this prophecy was spoken, and when the city was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. He seems to have been a man of eminent abilities, and under his government the Tyrians for a time prospered exceedingly. But being lifted up with the most excessive pride, he arrogated divine honours to himself, as many vain-glorious monarchs have done. His sovereignty over the seas was so uncontrolled, and his authority was so firmly established, that he seemed to himself to reign as a god in the midst of the seas; and to be placed on the throne of God, rather than on that of a man. Yet was he a poor frail mortal man, and not God, though he affected to be absolute, independent, and honoured as a deity. Daniel, who was at this time not more than thirty-six years of age, being employed in the court of the king of Babylon, had become exceedingly renowned for his wisdom in all the concerns of government, as well as in interpreting dreams, and resolving difficult questions: but the king of Tyre supposed himself to be wiser than he, and that no secret could be hid from him. He was perhaps a man of learning, and understood many abstruse subjects; or he had discovered the secret machinations of his enemies, which he ascribed to his own discernment, and supposed that nothing could elude his penetration. But the chief use of his wisdom was to increase his revenues and treasures, by protecting the trade and wealth of his subjects. This he ascribed to his own wise counsels: and thus his riches tended in every way to enhance his pride and self-sufficiency. (Is. xlvii. 7-10.)

V. 6—10. "Thou didst think in thine heart, that thou "was equal with God." (Old Tr.) (John v. 18, Phil. ii. 6.) This haughty prince was become the rival of the Lord of Hosts, and robbed him of his glory; who therefore resolved to resist and abase him. The Chaldeans were not numbered among the people who traded with the Tyrians, but were strangers; yet the Lord had chosen them to execute his sentence against that city and her king. They were the most terrible of the nations, and would oppose their victorious arms to Ethbaal's self-wise politics. By besieging, and at length taking and destroying, Tyre, they would tarnish and defile all his beauty and splendour: and they would bring him down to the grave, without any honour or ceremony; as those who are slain at sea, are thrown overboard to be devoured by the fishes. And would he still boast that he was a god, when in the hands of the executioners of the Lord's vengeance on him? Certainly his death would prove the contrary: and as he would die out of God's covenant and under his wrath, and the death of the wicked, (which was meant by the death of the uncircumcised,) he would perish miserably in every sense. "Thou shalt come to the same ill end as befals the other enemies of God and of his truth." (Louth.) Hiram king of Tyre, was the friend of David and Solomon, and probably a pious person: yet his successors had joined the enemies of God, and Ithobals especially would have his portion among them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—15. The prophet was directed to conclude the prediction against Tyre with a lamentation, or poetical elegy, over this haughty monarch; which would be the more remarkable, as he was at that time at the height of pride and prosperity. Ithobals's opinion of his own dignity and his ostentation of magnificence, are described in very remarkable language. He vainly thought himself to be the sun of all excellency; that his abilities, personal accomplishments, authority, and splendour, comprised the fulness of wisdom and the perfection of beauty; and that they were his by an unalienable tenure, securely sealed up among his treasures. He thought his dignity as great, and his advantages as many, as those of Adam in Eden, in the garden of God. His crown was formed, and his garments decorated, with abundance of precious stones: of these nine are mentioned, which were set in gold, and were the same as nine of those that were placed in the breast-plate of the high-priest, whom some think he meant to vie with in this particular. Tabrets, and other musical instruments, had been prepared for him with exquisite skill; either to celebrate his coronation, the day when he was created king, or his birth, and afterwards his birth-day, as it annually returned. Perhaps he had been anointed king, according to the custom in Israel: it was his office to cover or protect his people, and for this purpose God had raised him to his throne: but he forgot his dependence on him, deemed himself able to do it by his own power, and shone in his own eyes, as an angel in heaven, or a deity. This refers to the cherubim that covered the mercy-seat, which were anointed with the holy ointment, along with the ark of the covenant, &c. (Marg. Ref.) or to those who guarded the entrance of Eden, and kept every way the tree of life. In this conceit of his own excellency, and counting himself equal to the inhabitants of heaven, the holy mountain of God, he walked up and down, surrounded and decorated with precious stones, sparkling like fire. Indeed the affairs of Tyre had been managed by him with great prudence and success, from the beginning of his reign; till the detection of his iniquity brought down the wrath of God upon him, and then he was infatuated to his ruin.—The expressions used in this poetical description of the excessive pride of this monarch, seem to allude to the fall of angels, and to that of Adam in Paradise; and they intimated that his ruin would be owing to the same cause, and attended with similar effects to him. (Notes, Is. xiv. 4—20.) He is likewise supposed to have been a type of the Roman antichrist, of whom similar things are spoken in the New Testament; and almost the whole of this description may be accommodated to that proud enemy of God and his truth. But indeed the character, pretensions, and fall of one man, who has been intoxicated with power and pride, so resembles those of others of the same spirit, that it is not always easy to determine, whether the coincidence arises from this circumstance, or whether the one was intended to be a type of the other.

Thou wast, &c. "An exact description of the angelical perfection in which the devil was created; and in which he continued, till, being lifted up with pride, he fell from his estate." (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

Pride is peculiarly the sin of our fallen nature, the essence of our apostacy, and the very poison which Satan's temptation infused into the hearts of our first parents, and through them into those of all their children. Every possession, endowment, or distinction, which the Lord confers upon us, serves to excite and give energy to this hateful propensity: and we are disposed to idolize the gifts, or to glory in them as if from ourselves; and to forget the Giver, to become his rivals, and to speak and act, as if we were independent of him and sufficient to our own safety and happiness. To such a tremendous excess has this disease sometimes arisen, that poor dying worms have fancied themselves deities; have demanded temples, sacrifices, and adoration; have dreamed, that they were able to save or to destroy; and have presumed to arrogate the style, and attempted to exercise the peculiar prerogatives, of the most High God! But the mightiest and the most accomplished monarch, whose heart is thus lifted up and intoxicated by dignity and prosperity, may be assured, that God will resist and abase him: and what a wretch will he be proved at last, who, having been honoured and flattered as more than human through life; dies in his sins, and has his eternal portion with the devil and his angels in the bottomless pit! Then, at least, the delusion will cease, and he will know himself to be a feeble and wretched, because a sinful, man. What then is that wisdom, of which so many boast, as if no secret could be hid from them? It may perhaps serve to amass riches and other incentives to their worldly lusts: yet even in this respect, both the exercise and the success of it depend on the providence of God. If in these things they were wiser and more prosperous than Daniel or than Solomon; yet the most illiterate and despised believer is far wiser than they, in the most important matters; for "the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," which can alone lead to happiness temporal and eternal. Whereas all the wisdom in the world, is in fact insufficient to save men's bodies from the grave, or their souls from hell: it cannot secure their limbs from pain, or their hearts from anguish: and a fever or a blow may render the wisest man on earth an idiot or a lunatic to the end of his days.

V. 11—26.

How vain are all talents, beauty, dignity, or magnificence! How little would it avail us if we could seal all worldly accomplishments and distinctions among our treasures! Nay, were it possible to enter the garden of Eden, and to contemplate its beauties, feast upon its fruits; or even to enter heaven, that holy mountain of God, and among his angels to behold the glories, and hear the harmony of that blessed place: we could enjoy no solid happiness, without a humble, holy, and spiritual mind. Should the brightest Cherub or Seraph there, who has been perfect since the day in which he was created, discover the least pride and iniquity, he must be cast out as profane, even as Satan the first offender was: so that all wisdom and prosperity, which clate the heart, or are corrupted in devising or compassing iniquity, will soon prove to be folly and misery: and all the brightness of earthly magnificence, and the vain joys of sensual ungodly mirth, will soon be exchanged for weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth; except "godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation," intervene. Spiritual pride, however, is of all other most diabolical; and when men are pulled up with knowledge, gifts, or eminence in the Church of God; when they ambitiously usurp authority, and arrogate to themselves the power over men's consciences, or pretend to change the laws of God; when they mis-take external pomp for the beauty of holiness, carnal policy for heavenly wisdom, and gain for godliness, and shine as angels in their own esteem: they peculiarly resemble Satan in heaven, when iniquity was first found in him; and are near a similar destruction to his, when he was cast down to hell. Such men often defile sacred places and functions by their iniquities and their infamous traffic about spiritual things: and they may expect to perish by no common destruction, but to be made a warning to others not to copy their sacrilege, blasphemy, and presumption. It is exceedingly difficult to possess any distinction, without being proud of it; or to conduct extensive and lucrative trade, without covetousness, oppression, or iniquity: indeed this can be learned no where, except in the school of Christ, and by the teaching of his Spirit. In short, sin alone can ruin a holy creature: and only he who taketh away sin, is able to do real good to fallen man. Happy therefore is the true Christian: though poor, afflicted, and despised; though destitute of shining talents, and exposed to pricking thorns and briers, or terrible persecutions. For whilst the cup of the Lord's indignation goes round, and he is glorified in executing judgments on his proud and prosperous enemies: he will display his truth, power, and mercy, in the salvation and everlasting honour and felicity of his redeemed people. Let others then celebrate the genius and learning of Greece, and the magnificence and riches of Tyre, Babylon, or Rome. Let us celebrate the praises of Zion, the city of our God, of which glorious things are spoken by the Lord himself: let us seek no other honours or distinctions than those which belong to all her citizens; and whatever else we remain ignorant of, let us seek the humbling sanctifying knowledge of God, and the enlarged experience of his salvation. Then we shall be enabled to say, "The lines are fallen unto me in a pleasant place: "yea, I have a goodly heritage."

to give them a suitable recompense. He would therefore employ them in the conquest of Egypt, which being weakened by civil wars, would be an easy prey, and abundantly enrich them with its spoil. This prophecy was a confirmation of the preceding, which had been delivered almost seventeen years before.

V. 21. This seems to refer to the increasing influence and authority of Daniel, in the court of Nebuchadrezzar; and the more favourable disposition of that prince to the religion of the Jews, during the latter part of his life. It may also relate to the deliverance of Jeconiah from prison, and the favour shown him by Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadrezzar; which was a token for good to the house of Israel, in that the family of David began again in some measure to prosper. But some think that that day, relates to the termination of the forty years of Egypt's desolations, when the captivity of the Jews would also cease. We may suppose, that Ezekiel continued prophesying, when Daniel was in authority, and after Jeconiah's enlargement, with greater encouragement and effect than before: but this, as connected with the former part of the next chapter, seems to be the latest prophecy of his that is transmitted to us. "When thy prophecies are made good by the event, this shall add a new authority to what thou speakest." (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Wherever we turn our attention, we discover evidences of the pride and folly of the human heart; and of the abhorrence with which God beholds those who forget their dependence on him, and rob him of the glory due to his name. Prosperous oppressors are amongst the human species, as crocodiles in a river, or sea-monsters in the great waters: and whilst they prey without remorse on their inferiors, they should be regarded as the common enemies of mankind. Yet they have commonly bewitched the greatest part of those whom they have enslaved into a stupid admiration of their power and success, and into a pertinacious adherence to them even to their own ruin!—When princes and their subjects unite in impiety and iniquity, the Lord often renders them reciprocally the occasions, or instruments, of each other's punishment. For he is against, and will show himself above, the most powerful and insolent workers of iniquity; and can easily subdue those who set all others, and even him, at defiance. He fights against those who injure his people, and still more against such as seduce them from their confidence in him, and draw them into sin. And though they deserve to be deceived, wounded, and deserted by those in whom they have sinfully confided: yet their tempters and deceivers must expect the severest punishment. The desolating judgments and the avenging sword, which the Lord hath sent forth into all parts of the earth, and the inconceivable miseries and havoc that war hath made in every age and nation, prove that the world is full of wickedness: and these lamentable scenes not only illustrate the justice of God; but they are the natural effect of man's pride, revenge, ambition, avarice, and callous selfishness: they prove him to be the child, and to bear the image, of the arch-apostate, "the murderer from the beginning;" and to possess the same nature with the first-born of fallen Adam, who murdered his righteous brother. But it is a relief to the pious and humane mind to discern traces of the superintending providence of God, and of the truth of his word, in reviewing these dark transactions. The history of nations, in their rise, progress, and decline, is the best exposition of ancient prophecies: all events, in one way or other, fulfil the Scriptures, and turn to the believer for a testimony; for he remembers, that "thus it was written and thus it must be." All things work together for the good of the Church; even nations are reduced, to remove from the people of God the occasions of sin, and to promote their holiness: and in the midst of the most tremendous scenes of war and bloodshed, he is bringing forward those glorious times of truth, and righteousness, and peace, which he hath promised shall succeed these convulsions. Thus in the deepest scenes of our adversity he sows the seed of our future prosperity. The Lord hath raised up for us a Horn of salvation in the house of his servant David: and he will shortly raise up ministers, and open their mouths, to proclaim his Gospel throughout the earth. Like a rich and generous master, he will not let any man serve him for nothing; if he employ ambitious or covetous men as his executioners, he will recompense them according to the leading desires of their hearts: and verily every man shall have his reward. Happy then are they, who desire his favour, grace and image, and relish the spiritual blessings of his new covenant: they will delight in his service, and not covet any recompense, except his merciful acceptance; while the riches, honours, and pleasures which they have chosen, shall be ensured to them for ever and ever.

THE word of the LORD came again unto me, saying, Son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord God; Howl ye, Woe worth the day!

3 For the day is near, even the day of the LORD is near, a cloudy day; it shall be the time of the heathen.

10 Thus saith the Lord God ; † I will also make the multitude of Egypt to cease by the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon.

12 And y I will make the rivers * dry, and * sell the land into the hand of the wicked: and I will make the land waste, and † all that is therein, ° by the hand of strangers: † the Lord have spoken it.

13 Thus saith the Lord God ; b I will also destroy the idols, and I will cause their images to cease out of ° Noph; and did not invade that country till he had taken Tyre ; it is probable, that this prophecy was delivered about the same time with that in the close of the former chapter, and several years after those which follow. The Egyptians were called upon to howl with anguish in the prospect of these judgments; as they surely would do when they arrived: and to cry "Wo worth the day," or alas the day; intimating that it would be the most dreadful day which they had ever seen. For it would be the day in which God would execute vengeance on his enemies; and so a cloudy day, or one of uncommon terror and distress, especially as clouds and rain were rarely known in Egypt. It would also be the time of the heather; the time of divine judgments on the Gentiles, as there had been a time of his wrath and judgments on the Jews. God's judgments on particular places and nations are an earnest of that general judgment, when he shall execute judgment on all the ungodly. (Lowth.)

V. 4, 5. As Ethiopia bordered on Egypt, and was in alliance with the Egyptians, it would share in these extreme calamities: and their forces would be slain among those of Egypt. For the foundations of her cities, or those of her government, would be broken down; and all her allies and mercenary troops from different nations, would fall by the sword.—The names in the Hebrew are 'Cush, Phut, and Lud.' (Marg. Ref.) 'Phut may signify some part of Africa near Egypt, and Lud probably signifies some part of the Abyssine's country.' The 'Cubii' are mentioned in Ptolemy, as the people of Mareotis, a province of Egypt. The seventy translate it, (the last clause,) 'the men of my league, or covenant; i. e. the Jews; many of whom fleeing into Egypt, were there destroyed with the Egyptians.' (Lowth.)

who are called "the stay of the tribes thereof." (Is. xix. 13.) (Lowth.)
From, &c. Or, "From Migdol to Syene." (Note, xxix. 8—11.)

V. 7. Her cities, &c. Egypt was exceedingly populous and more filled with cities than any other nation in the world at that time; which would render her desolation the more extraordinary.

V. 9. The providence of God would take care, that messengers should be sent in ships by sea, or boats upon the Nile, to inform the Ethiopians of the ruin of Egypt, and to alarm them with fears of similar calamities; from which they carelessly deemed themselves secure. Perhaps Nebuchadrezzar sent these messengers to summon the Ethiopians to surrender. They would however occasion them great distress and terror, similar to the astonishment of the nations, in the day when the Egyptians were destroyed at the Red Sea; (Ex. xv. 15, 16.) or to what the Egyptians had just before endured.

V. 10, 11. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. If the rivers of Egypt had been dried up, that fruitful land must have become a barren desert; and the Lord was about as effectually to destroy all the sources of its power and prosperity: for he would as entirely deliver up the land into the possession of wicked and oppressing spoilers, as if he had sold it to them. Such were the Chaldeans, who first conquered, plundered, and enslaved Egypt; and the Persians, Macedonians, Romans, Saracens, Mamulucks, and Turks, who have successively domineered over and oppressed that country, equally deserved this character. These strangers have wasted, and cruelly tyrannized over Egypt from that time to this present day; according to the word of God by Ezekiel.

V. 13. The Egyptians were not more renowned among the ancients for wisdom and learning, wealth, power, and prosperity; than for the multitude of their idols, and the stupidity with which they worshipped even various reptiles and vegetables. On these idols they depended for protection: but the Lord determined to destroy them with their worshippers, and the cities in which they were stationed. (Marg. Ref.) This hath been remarkably fulfilled; for the ancient idolatry of Egypt gradually declined, or was exchanged for that of other nations, when the country fell under the dominion of foreign lords: and as there hath not been for above two thousand years a prince of the land of Egypt: (Note, xxix. 15.) so the Egyptians have long received their religion from their masters, and have been an abject servile race, greatly afraid of offending their cruel oppressors. The present Egyptians are either Mahometans; or an ignorant superstitious kind of Christians, who seem to have little more than the name of that holy religion. (Notes, &c. Jer. xliiii. 8—13. xlvii.)

^u Yokes. 'When I shall set those at liberty, that are oppressed by the bondage of Egypt.' (Lenth.) The Septuagint renders the word ^v scythes, and perhaps properly.

V. 20—26. This prophecy was delivered soon after the Egyptians had come to relieve Jerusalem, when besieged by Nebuchadnezzar; but had gone back unto their own land without effecting any thing; and some months before that city was taken: that is, more than sixteen years before the preceding prophecies. The Lord then informed his servant, that he had broken the arm of Pharaoh, and that it never should be set or bound up, to be healed and made strong to hold a sword any more. When the king of Babylon took from the king of Egypt all his dominions in Asia, one of his arms was broken. This had taken place some time before in the time of Pharaoh-necho: and the Lord declared, that he should never recover those territories, or any ascendancy in that part of the world; nay, that his other arm, which was now strong, should soon be broken; so that the sword would drop out of that likewise. This took place under his son and successor, when Egypt was so weakened by civil wars, as to be wholly unable to resist the invaders: and when Pharaoh-hophra was van-

CHAP. XXXI.

The prophet is ordered to show Pharaoh the prosperity and pride of the king of Assyria; and his dreadful fall, 1—17: and that he would be destroyed in like manner, 18.

AND it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the third month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, and to his multitude;

3 Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud, and of an high stature; and his top was among the thick boughs.

4 The waters made him great, the deep set him up on high with her rivers running round about his plants, and sent out her little rivers unto all the trees of the field.

5 Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long because of the multitude of waters, when he shot forth.

6 All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all great nations.

7 Thus was he fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches: for his root was by great waters.

8 The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him: the fir-trees were not like his boughs, and the chesnut-trees were not like his branches; nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty.

9 I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches: so that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him.

quished, dethroned, and driven into the fens to hide himself from Amasis and his party. These events made way for Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of that kingdom. All this time he was acquiring strength and enlarging his dominions: for the Lord strengthened his arms, and put the sword of his vengeance into his hand. Thus the Egyptians were vanquished, enslaved, dispersed, and carried captive. In the mean time Hophra, equally obnoxious to both the contending parties, dragged on his life in great terror and misery: and at length, after a fruitless effort to recover his authority, he was taken and strangled by Amasis, who succeeded, as the vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, to the throne of this desolated and ruined country.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

That power which renders men proud must come down; and that prosperity and peace, which lead to carelessness and carnal security, will terminate in terror and anguish.—The wrath of God consumes the prosperity and wealth of powerful nations, when the day of his vengeance comes; it desolates populous countries, or covers them with the carcases of the slain: it turns a fruitful land into a barren desert, and flourishing cities into ruinous heaps: it fills all places with terror and misery, and reduces men to the most abject servitude: yet these are only present effects of the divine indignation, and not worthy of our fear, compared with the wrath to come, from which Jesus delivers his people. It is vain to endeavour to bind up the arm which the Lord is pleased to break, or to strengthen those whom he will bring down: a dark and cloudy day awaits his enemies, and all, who associate with them, or help them, will share their punishment. All power and success is from the Lord; and men prosper so long, as they are employed in executing his righteous purposes. Happy are his willing servants, who so know him “in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,” as to fear, love, trust, worship, and obey him. In one way or other, however, all shall know the Lord: and they who disregard the discoveries which he hath made of himself in mercy, will at length know his power, truth, and justice, in the punishment inflicted on them for their sins: whilst they will be for ever excluded from all hope of his favour; and groan and wail, because their wound is incurable. All earthly prosperity is fluctuating: they who to-day are at the top of the wheel, before to-morrow may be turned to the bottom, and their arrogant presumption changed into abject despair. But the everlasting mercy of our unchangeable God secures the final felicity of all that love his name.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 2. Pharaoh, &c. The prophet could not personally address Pharaoh, or his numerous attendants, forces, or subjects: but his prophecies would doubtless be made known in Chaldea, and by degrees in other countries; and they might come to the ears of the Egyptian king. This prophecy was delivered about a month before Jerusalem was taken. Pharaoh was very proud of his power and greatness: and the prophet inquired to whom he supposed himself to be like? Doubtless he thought himself, and was celebrated by his flatterers, as equal to the greatest monarchs that had ever lived: but even if this had been true, it would not have secured the continuance of his prosperity; for the event had shown, that the most renowned and successful kings and kingdoms might soon be brought to destruction.

10 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height, and he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs, and his heart is lifted up in his height;

11 I have therefore delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen; he shall surely deal with him: I have driven him out for his wickedness.

12 And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him: upon the mountains and in all the valleys his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land; and all the people of the earth are gone down from his shadow, and have left him.

13 Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches:

14 To the end that none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height, neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs, neither their trees stand up in their height, all that drink water: for they are all delivered unto death, to the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit.

15 Thus saith the Lord God; in the day when he went down to the grave I caused a mourning; I covered the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed; and I caused Lebanon to mourn for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him.

V. 3-9. The Assyrian monarchy was one of the most ancient and prosperous, that we read of in history. It seems to have attained its summit of greatness under Salmanser and Sennacherib. But it is not certainly known when and by whom it was destroyed. Probably it was reduced about the time that Nebuchadnezzar began his reign at Babylon, by him and Cyaxares king of Media. Nineveh, the capital of that monarchy, which was one of the most extensive cities ever built, was then taken, and from that time began to decay, until it was at length so entirely desolated, that modern travellers are not agreed where it was situated. These events will be more particularly considered upon several passages in the prophecies of Jonah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. But here the prophet mentioned the fall of the Assyrian monarchy, as a fact which was well known to have lately taken place. The Assyrian king had been highly exalted in his kingdom: and his great power, and extensive dominions, with the protection he afforded to his friends, resembled the spreading branches, the thick shade, and the high stature of a very flourishing cedar on mount Lebanon. The fruitful lands of Assyria; the large revenues which the king drew from vast multitudes all over his extensive territories; his extensive commerce, through the river Tygris, with the countries bordering on the Indian ocean; or in a word, the various sources of his wealth and prosperity, resembled the rivers and streams, which cause the trees planted by them to grow exceedingly. By these means this empire and its head were exalted above all the kingdoms of the earth; their power became more formidable, and their vassals more numerous than those of any other people: so that cities, provinces, and nations, courted their alliance; took shelter under their powerful protection; and increased and prospered under it, as the fowls of the air amidst the boughs, and the beasts of the field under the covert, of the wide spreading lofty cedar. Thus the monarch became renowned and honourable: and this cedar in Lebanon grew more lofty, than any cedar in the garden of God, or in Eden; or any of the kingdoms or independent states, which might be compared to fir-trees, and chesnut-trees, or any other stately and beautiful trees. Perhaps the ascendancy acquired by the Assyrian monarchs over the kings of Judah likewise, may be alluded to by the expression, that "no tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty." However, they were so prospered in the providence of God, that all other kings and princes envied them their great success and renown.

 V. 10-13. The allegory and its interpretation are here interwoven. The Assyrian monarch though already destroyed, was poetically addressed; and probably the whole race of those princes who reigned in succession was intended, as the description so exactly suits the character of Sennacherib; (Notes, Is. x. xxxvi. xxxvii.) They were ambitious of reducing all other kings and nations to subjection, and of establishing an universal monarchy; and their pride increased in proportion to their power and success. The Lord had therefore delivered the last of that line into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen, or the conqueror of the nations, who was able to deal with him; even Nebuchadnezzar, the subverter of the Assyrian monarchy. By him the Lord had driven the king of Assyria from his throne, his palace, his royal city, and his kingdom, for his wickedness. The Chaldeans, a people to whom the nations had hitherto been strangers, (as they were but lately risen into eminence,) but who were most terrible for valour and fierceness, cut down this lofty cedar, and left him to wither and decay. So large was it grown, that its fallen branches covered the mountains and valleys, and its broken boughs were found near all the rivers: that is, the fragments of this vast dismembered empire formed many states and kingdoms. And when the nations found that the Assyrian king could no longer protect them, they renounced their allegiance to him: nay, the very persons, who had courted his friendship, now preyed upon him and insulted over him! Or literally, the birds and beasts of prey came to devour the carcasses of the multitudes, who were slain in these conflicts.

' This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, saith the Lord God.

V. 14—17. The Lord destroyed the Assyrian monarchy, for a warning to all other kings and nations, not to be ambitious of dominion, or proud of pre-eminence, or secure in prosperity; and not to depend on themselves, or forget God as the Author of their advantages; for the rivers, whence they drank waters, came originally from that Ocean. All the monarchs of Assyria, or the last king and all his proud princes; and all those in every age, who had domineered over their neighbours, and despised God, had been delivered to death, and their bodies were gone under the earth, amidst the rest of the children of men, even like the meanest of them, who without funeral pomp are thrown into the pit: and this was the end of their greatness, to which many of them had been hurried by a violent and premature death. Indeed when the Assyrian monarch went down to the grave, the Lord so ordered it, that there was a great mourning for him. 'The deep, ' that nursed up this fair tree, is described as mourning at 'its downfall; as if the floods had stopped their usual course, on purpose to lament his fate. The forest of Lebanon, sympathized with his misfortunes; that is, all 'his confederates and allies.' (Lowth.) His fall affected many nations and provinces, and vast multitudes of people, who had lived under his government and contributed to his greatness. A stop was put by his death to their enriching commerce, and to all the business connected with the government of so vast an empire: and all who grew rich by collecting the revenue, or by honourable and lucrative offices, would doubtless lament his fall. This seems to be meant by the Lord's covering the deep, and restraining the floods, as in mourning for him: which denote a stagnation of that profitable circulation, which there must be in a prosperous empire, betwixt all parts of it and the seat of government. Especially the Assyrian nobles and people, the Lebanon where this cedar grew, doubtless deplored the loss of that empire which they had so long possessed, and fainted for grief and for apprehensions of the fatal effects that might follow this catastrophe. The surrounding nations also shook at the sound, or report of this revolution, (as the fall of a mighty cedar may be heard at a great distance.) Yet when the Lord cast him into the grave and the invisible world, they who had formerly envied or rivalled him, and who had grown prosperous by similar resources, till he had reduced and ruined them, would be comforted and rejoice to see him ruined in like manner. This is represented under the bold figure of those that lay in the grave, or in the state of the dead, congratulating each other, when they saw their destroyer coming to join them in that abject situation! (Is. xiv. 9—12.) And they also, who confided in his protection, and were his support, (his soldiers, captains, and confederates,) had been slain with him, and were with him gone down into the grave and the world of departed spirits.

V. 18. Pharaoh is here called to look in this class, and to see what his glory and greatness would speedily come to. Even if he were as honourable and powerful as the Assyrian king: he would soon be slain, and die a miserable death, and perish among those who were strangers and enemies to God. This sentence was irrevocably passed on Pharaoh and all his multitude.

This is, &c. 'The word is, commonly denotes the same as to signify, or represent, especially in prophecies, parables, and such like figurative descriptions.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

What competition and striving is there among men about the precarious, unsatisfactory, and perishing distinctions of this world! But how few are candidates for that "crown of glory which fadeth not away!" Many of the most powerful, prosperous, and renowned, have also been the most abominable of mankind: and whilst millions have been subjected to their will, perhaps they had not one subject more vile in the sight of God than themselves. This consideration may serve to abate our admiration of those gaudy distinctions, which the Lord evidently deems so worthless and perilous; and may teach us to seek more valuable and enduring advantages. All greatness and success come from God, through whatever channels they are conveyed: but how few properly consider their dependence on him and obligations to him! Generally prosperity increases pride, presumption, and impiety, in regular proportion. They who have the most of those things which are supposed to constitute an earthly paradise, are either envied themselves, or envy others, or both; and this greatly interrupts the little enjoyment which otherwise they might find in them: but the blessings of the heavenly paradise are not liable to such alloy. How much better then is it to be a lowly tree of righteousness, yielding fruit to the glory of God and the good of men, and in the end to be transplanted into the garden of God above, to flourish for ever, than to be a lofty cedar, and at length to be cut down and cast into the fire of hell!

their subjects: and this entitles them to allegiance, submission, and tribute from them. We should be thankful for the blessings of civil government, and not envy those who bear the burden of governing; and who, if they abuse their trust, will have a still heavier burden of punishment laid upon them in another world. The Lord never drives men from their possessions, or bereaves them of their comforts, but when he can show that their sins deserved it. He has executioners ready, when vengeance is to be taken: but we need not desire to be the mighty, or the terrible, of the nations, to be thus employed; seeing it is far more pleasant and profitable to follow Him, who "went about doing good." They who trust in princes, will soon be driven from their confidences or perish with them; and they who selfishly favour the prosperous, will as selfishly desert or prey upon them, when they are fallen. The higher men soar in power and pride, the more terrible will be their fall: and such conspicuous characters commonly involve multitudes of friends and dependents in their ruin, and are sincerely lamented by those who are losers by their calamities. Yet some will rejoice to see them reduced to as abject a condition as themselves: but the gratification of envy, revenge, and malignity, is a wretched comfort, suited only to the inhabitants of hell. In the fate of proud, ungodly oppressors of former ages, they, who tread in their steps, may read their own doom: and the Lord executes such extraordinary judgments on purpose to warn others from their destructive courses. It is the end of wicked men of every age, nation, and condition in life, to go down into the grave, to die with the uncircumcised, and to have their portion in the unquenchable fire of hell: and they who delight in war, commonly perish by the sword. The wicked man is indeed often seen flourishing like the cedar, and spreading like the green bay tree: but the pious observer will notice, that he soon passes away, and is not; and when he seeks him, his place can no where be found. But let us "mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. This was about a year and a half after the destruction of Jerusalem; and at a time when Pharaoh continued in the undisturbed possession of his power and prosperity. It is remarkable, that there should be so many predictions concerning the ruin of this monarch, and the desolations of his kingdom. But Egypt had been the first oppressor of the Church, and was to be judged for it; and perhaps that kingdom typified antichrist, and the more dreadful ruin that awaits him: (Gen. xv. 13, 14. Rev. xi. 8.)

V. 2—6. The Egyptian king had resembled a young and fierce lion, in his conduct both towards his subjects and his neighbours: or, in allusion to the seas and rivers, with which his kingdom was bounded and intersected, he was a sea-monster, or a crocodile. (Marg. Ref.) In the height of his prosperity he raised a vast army, and made war upon the Cyrenians: but he was vanquished, and his army cut in pieces; and the Egyptians, suspecting from his savage temper, that he had led them forth on purpose to be thus destroyed, made an insurrection against him; which he increased by further cruelties and rash measures, until it made way for his ruin. Thus the voracious crocodile went forth with, or from, his rivers, to trouble and foul those of his neighbours: but the Lord spread his net upon him, and used a company of many people to drag him out of his rivers; and he was then cast forth upon the open field, to be devoured by the birds and beasts of prey. To represent Pharaoh's great power, and the effects of his fall, it was figuratively stated, that the flesh of this overgrown monster was so vast, that it would cover the mountains and fill the valleys; and that his blood would be sufficient to drench the land even to the mountains, and to fill the rivers; as when the waters were turned into blood in the days of Moses. This denotes, that his ruin would be attended with terrible miseries to the Egyptians, and afford an immense booty to their enemies.

V. 7, 8. Pharaoh thought himself the great luminary of Egypt: but the Lord declared, that he would put him out by dethroning him. Then the whole land would be darkened, as if the sun, moon, planets, and stars were all eclipsed, and hidden at once; and the darkness would be as entire, as in the plague that was inflicted in the time of Moses. These bold metaphors denote the total subversion of the state; the anarchy and civil wars which ensued; the miseries attending the Chaldean invasion; and the contempt, baseness, and abject slavery, to which that once flourishing kingdom was about to be reduced. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. When the report of the ruin of Egypt should reach many distant nations, and the fugitives, or exiles, should relate the particulars to those among whom they were dispersed, it would greatly disquiet their hearts; even though they had not been any ways connected with that kingdom: for it would be a most affecting instance of the instability of human affairs, and of God's wrath against the enemies of his people. They would thus see, as it were, the Lord brandishing his sword before their eyes, which would fill them with amazement and terror; and every one of them would tremble continually, lest the next stroke should destroy them in like manner.

V. 11-14. The desolations of Egypt were effected by the king of Babylon; and this was the sword which was hung over the head of Pharaoh, though his fall was immediately wrought by his own subjects. The Chaldeans, by invading Egypt, were about to destroy the multitudes of its inhabitants, and to terminate its splendour and dignity:

and enemies to God. Or the nation may be meant, the total ruin of which was described by the death and burial of an individual.

V. 20. Draw, &c. Let the Chaldeans drag Egypt, and her multitudes, like criminals to execution, or drag their corpses out to be buried disgracefully in a pit.

V. 21. Pharaoh is here poetically represented as entering the state of the dead, whither many mighty warriors and potentates had gone before him; and he is addressed, and welcomed by them to their dreary habitation. The bold imagery of eastern poetry abounds in these descriptions: yet they imply the general belief that when the body is cast into the grave, the soul enters an invisible state, where it retains its consciousness and capacities.—
 ‘Here follows a poetical description of the infernal regions, where the ghosts of deceased tyrants, with their subjects, are represented as coming to meet the king of Egypt and his auxiliaries. Hell, signifies here the state of the dead.’ (Louth.)

V. 22, 23. The king of Assyria was ready to meet Pharaoh, when he should be made “free among the dead.” He is represented as surrounded by the graves of multitudes, that had been slain along with him. These were set in the sides of that pit, into which the Assyrian had fallen before it came to Pharaoh’s turn. The subversion of the monarchy and the destruction of the people, as well as the death of the king, was intended by this representation. They had caused terror in the land of the living, but being slain and buried, they lay quiet in the pit, and none feared them. The Jewish expositors understand the land of Israel, by the land of the living, because the way of life and salvation was there known.

V. 24, 25. Nebuchadnezzar is supposed to have conquered the province of Elam, which formed a part of Persia. It is therefore represented as fallen with the multitude of its inhabitants into the grave, having been slain by the sword. They too had been renowned and terrible; but at length they bore the shame of being defeated and destroyed. A bed, or coffin, was placed for Elam, (the nation being represented as a deceased woman,) in the midst of all her multitude: and their king also was placed among those that were slain.

V. 26—28. Meshech and Tubal seem to mean the Scythians and northern nations, who frequently made incursions into the southern and more fertile countries of Asia, and caused great terror and devastation; but generally perished with as dreadful a slaughter. They too had caused terror in the land of the living; yet they would not lie with the mighty, or be numbered with the Assyrian or Egyptian monarchies. But they went down to death, with their weapons of war in their hands, as men who fought desperately and scorned to yield; and they were buried with their swords laid under their heads, as denoting their characters and exploits; whilst their iniquities or depredations had brought their bones to the grave, and perhaps afterwards exposed them to insults from those whom they had injured. Among such persons would Pharaoh be broken, and slain, and perish. Some give another sense to the passage. ‘They shall not lie among those heroes who died a natural death, and are laid in the grave with pomp and magnificence: who were carried to their graves in state; and had their achievements and other ensigns of honour affixed to their monuments for perpetuating their memory.’ (Louth.)

V. 30. The north. This may mean the Medes, Armenians, or other nations north of Babylon; or rather, the Tyrians and Syrians north of Judah, who were more likely to be mentioned with the Zidonians.

V. 31, 32. When Pharaoh should enter the state of the dead, and see all these kings and nations who had gone before him, he would the more willingly submit to his doom. This is spoken according to the common sentiments of mankind, who are better satisfied to suffer with a multitude than alone: though it can be no comfort to those who have perished in their sins, to find multitudes as miserable as themselves. In short, they had caused their terror in the land of the living; and the Lord was about to cause his terror to fall upon them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS:

V. 1-16.

How weak and helpless, in respect of the Almighty, are the most powerful and terrible of mankind! Whilst they ravage on every side, devour their own species, and trouble the nations of the earth, to gratify their mad ambition or revenge, he spreads his net over them, entangles them, and disposes of them at his pleasure; and their former greatness only renders them a richer prey, or a more tremendous spectacle, to those around them! Thus "the lamp of the wicked is put out;" the pomp and splendour of kings and kingdoms are totally extinguished; their sun goes down at noon; and their boasted luminaries set to rise no more! Terror and amazement must needs seize the hearts of those against whom the Lord brandishes his sword; and they must tremble every moment for their lives and souls. It is very mortifying to the pride of man, to consider what numbers, that once "caused" "terror in the land of the living," are now gone down to the grave. They who made the earth to tremble, and whose renown and power extended to the most distant regions, are now confined within the narrow limits of the tomb. They whose counsels and eloquence swayed the determinations of princes and nations, and had as extensive effects on human affairs as the sword of the mighty, now lie silent in the dust! They whose wisdom, learning, beauty, wit, or politeness, were celebrated by numerous admirers, are now decayed and mingled with their original earth! Whilst the unnoticed multitudes, who go down obscurely to the grave, by thousands every hour, are vast beyond conception. All this is the punishment of sin, and the execution of the sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

V. 17--32.

It is inconceivable how great a proportion of the human race have been prematurely hurried into the grave, by the diabolical trade of war. As if men did not die fast enough of themselves! or as if destruction were the most honourable and pleasing employment that the strong among the mighty of the earth could devise for themselves and their numerous retainers! The subject is in every view gloomy and horrid: but if we recollect, that when the body goes down to the dust, the soul enters into an unchangeable state of happiness or misery; that all who die uncircumcised in heart, unconverted and unbelieving, go down into the midst of hell, to bear for ever their shame and punishment; and that vast multitudes die in the very heat of their most malignant and diabolical passions, or in the midst of forbidden gratifications, with their unrepented iniquities upon their souls, and unmortified lusts domineering in their hearts; many of them also answerable for the crimes and destruction of their fellow sinners; the view becomes tremendous in the extreme. Alas, what are men about? How are they blinded and deceived by Satan! What are those objects, which they thus pursue, through scenes of horror and seas of blood, and multiplied impieties and iniquities? Surely man walketh in a vain shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain; whether he pursue riches, renown, power, or pleasure! Soon must he be torn from all his possessions and gratifications, to join the multitude of the dead; and to "receive the things done in the body, "whether they be good or evil," and it will be a wretched consolation to those who perish in their sins, that vast multitudes have gone, and are going, the same broad road to destruction: since as they were mutual tempters here, so they will be mutual tormentors hereafter; (Luke xvi. 27, 28.) As "the hour cometh when all that are in the "graves shall hear the voice of Christ, and shall come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation;" we, that have known something of the terror of the Lord, would fain persuade men to hearken to the voice of the great and terrible Judge, now that he speaks to them as a compassionate and merciful Saviour; and to seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness. Then being pardoned, justified, and sanctified, in the name

CHAP. XXXIII.

The prophet is instructed in the duties of his office, as the watchman of Israel, &—9; commanded to state the rule by which God dealt with them, and the equity of his conduct, 10—20; informed of the destruction of Jerusalem; and ordered to reprove the vain hopes and crimes of those who remained in the land, 21—29; and shown the hypocrisy and covetousness of those who came to hear the word of God from him, 30—33.

A GAIN the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

2 Son of man, ^a speak to the children of thy people, and ^b say unto them, * When I bring the sword upon a land, if the people of the land take a man of their coasts, and ^c set him for their watchman:

3 If when he seeth the sword come upon the land, ^d he blow the trumpet, and warn the people;

4 Then † whosoever ^e heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning; if the sword come, and take him away, † his blood shall be upon his own head.

5 He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him. ^g But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul.

6 But if the watchman see the sword come, ^h and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned; if the sword come, and take any person from among them, ⁱ he is taken away in his iniquity; but ^j his blood will I require at the watchman's hand.

7 So thou, O son of man, ^k I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore ^l thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me.

8 When I say unto the wicked, ^m O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; ⁿ if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, ^o that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand.

9 Nevertheless, ^p if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; ^q if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity; but ^r thou hast delivered thy soul.

10 ¶ Therefore, O thou son of man, speak unto the house of Israel; Thus ye speak, saying, ^s If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, ^t how should we then live!

of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God, they need not fear death or the grave: for Jesus hath engaged to receive the departing spirits of his people to his glorious presence: their bodies will feel no pain in the silent tomb: and he will at length raise them up also, incorruptible and glorious, that they may be for ever with him. Let us then comfort one another in this dying world with these words; and let us "be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, as knowing that our labour will not be in vain in the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 2—9. (Notes, &c. iii. 17—19.) The prophet had before been thus shown the important responsibility of his prophetic office: but after the most awful part of his predictions was accomplished, he was again reminded of it, and ordered to declare it to the people; that they might be taught to approve his faithfulness, and that he might be warned to persevere in it. They were called "the children of his people," as if God would disown them because of their wickedness. The instruction is the same as before; but the illustrations are more full and explicit. The Lord himself had sent the sword upon the land: and the recent transactions in Judah, where such numbers had been taken away in their sins, notwithstanding all the warnings given them, tended to render these topics more affecting. The repetition of this and similar warnings, after Jerusalem was taken and destroyed, showed that they did not refer merely to the circumstances of those times; but were applicable to individuals in every place, especially to those who are favoured with the oracles of God. "He showeth that the people ought to have continually governors and teachers who may have a care over them, and warn them ever of the dangers which are at hand. The wicked shall not escape punishment, though the watchman be negligent: but if the watchman blow the trumpet, and then he will not obey, he shall deserve double punishment." (Marg. Ref.) V. 10. "If, according to thy prophecies, God have determined to reckon with us for our sins, and to bring judgment upon us, to what purpose shall our conversion be? and how shall we live though we do amend?" (Bp. Hall.)—Thus the wicked when they hear God's judgments for their sins, despair of his mercies, and murmur, (xxiv. 23.)—The impenitent Jews seem to have charged inconsistency and contradiction upon the prophet's messages: for whilst he warned them to repent, and assured the penitent of forgiveness; he also predicted that the people would pine away in their transgressions. "Now," said they, "if this be the case, how should we live? And of what use are your exhortations and promises? You only tantalize us, and there is no sincerity in these pro‘posals: our ruin is decreed, and none of our repentance can prevent it.’ But in reality the prediction implied, that the people in general would be obstinately impenitent; though some individuals would repent and be pardoned. It showed, indeed, that the ruin of the city and nation was determined; but it did not relate to the final state of individuals, who would still be dealt with according to the rules before mentioned, and here again repeated.

V. 11. (Notes, xviii. 23—32.) The Lord had before demanded of the people, whether they supposed that he had any pleasure in the death of the wicked? But he here confirmed it with an oath, that he had none; as it was his delight that sinners should repent and live.—The verse may be rendered, “As I live, saith the Lord God, I am not delighted with the death of a sinner; but, I am delighted, when the wicked turns from his way and lives.” (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. (Notes, &c. iii. 20, 21. xviii.) The same truths are here again stated that have before been considered, but with some variation of expression: especially it is here added, that if the righteous man trust to his own righteousness and to the promises of life made to the righteous, and commit iniquity, his righteousness will not profit him. Men who think themselves righteous, and are so accounted by others, but who are not truly humble and spiritual, will, in one way or other, trust in their own righteousness. Some will so confide in their own supposed good works, as to neglect or despise the salvation of the Gospel: and yet whilst they trust to their own righteousness to justify them, the iniquities which they commit will most certainly condemn them. Others think, that as they are clear in their views, bold in their profession of the Gospel, zealous for its doctrines, and do much to promote them; it would be unbelief to doubt of their being true Christians, though they indulge their darling sins in secret, or grasp at immoderate or unlawful advantages. Thus they count themselves righteous persons, favourites of heaven, and interested in the promises of life: and yet they commit iniquity, and practically fall into the old detestable aphorism, “Let us sin on, that grace may abound.” Others, having for a time made a plausible profession of religion, conclude themselves certainly converted: and then venture into sin upon the supposition that God will not damn them for it; and quiet their consciences by abusing the doctrine of final perseverance, and the examples of some believers, of whom it is recorded in Scripture, that they fell into the same sins. It is possible for a true believer to be caught in any of these nets for a time: the only question is, whether he will or will not eventually be delivered from them, though by sharp rebukes and corrections, and thus return to God with weeping and supplication?

V. 14—16. (Note, xviii. 21—23.) ‘The sin is not forgiven, unless what is taken away be restored.’ (Augustin.) ‘He condemneth all of them of hypocrisy, who pretend to forsake wickedness, and yet declare not themselves such by their fruits; that is, in obeying God’s commandments, and by a godly life.’

was escaped came; and had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning: and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb.

23 Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying,

24 Son of man, they that inhabit those wastes of the land of Israel speak, saying, Abraham was one, and he inherited the land: but we are many; the land is given us for inheritance.

25 Wherefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Ye eat with the blood, and lift up your eyes towards your idols, and shed blood: and shall ye possess the land?

26 Ye stand upon your sword, ye work abomination, and ye defile every one his neighbour's wife: and shall ye possess the land?

27 Say thou thus unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; As I live, surely they that are in the wastes, shall fall by the sword, and him that is in the open field will I give to the beasts to be devoured, and they that be in the forts, and in the caves, shall die of the pestilence.

28 For I will lay the land very desolate, and the pomp of her strength shall cease, and the mountains of Israel shall be desolate, that none shall pass through.

29 Then shall they know that I am the Lord, when I have laid the land most desolate, because of all their abominations which they have committed.

30 Also, thou son of man, the children of thy people still are talking against thee by the walls, and in the doors of the houses, and speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying, Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord.

31 And they come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they will not do them: for with their mouth they show much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness.

32 And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but they do them not.

33 And when this cometh to pass, (lo, it will come,) then shall they know that a prophet hath been among them.

inherited it: but the remaining Jews were many; and they supposed themselves on that account more likely to keep possession of it. They, however, overlooked the contrary of their character to that of Abraham: they forgot that they had forfeited the title by their crimes; and that both former and latter prophets had predicted these desolations of the land. Thus they presumptuously expected to prosper in sin, and to be enriched by the ruin of their brethren. But the Lord sent them a message which was widely different from their expectations. In defiance of his law, and in conformity to the abominable superstitions of the nations, they ate with the blood and worshipped idols; they committed murder and made their sword the arbiter of their disputes, violently defending themselves in injustice: they were guilty of adultery and every abomination; and was it fitting that they should possess the land, from which their brethren had been driven for similar crimes? On the contrary, the Lord solemnly swore by himself, that they should all be destroyed by one or other of his judgments, wherever they took refuge; and that the land should be utterly desolated, and be deprived of all that pomp and strength in which they gloried. This was fulfilled, after the murder of Gedaliah, when the survivors fled into Egypt, where they miserably perished.

V. 30-33. Whilst the prophet was affectionately seeking the good of his people; they were continually

V. 21, 22. According to the date here given, this fugitive Jew did not come to the prophet, with the intelligence of Jerusalem's being smitten, till almost eighteen months after that event: and some learned men have supposed, that there is a mistake in the date, or that it ought to be calculated differently. No doubt, however, the prophet had heard of that event long before eighteen months had elapsed: but perhaps he had not received that full and authentic account of it from an eye-witness, which he was taught to expect, before he delivered any further messages from God to his people: (Note, xxiv. 25-27.) For above three years he had been dumb, in this respect at least: perhaps he had been able to converse with the Jews, concerning the predictions that he had formerly delivered to them; and perhaps he spake, or delivered in writing, to them, the prophecies which he uttered concerning other nations: but he had received no further revelation from God respecting their affairs; in this sense he had been dumb. But now his mouth was opened, and he prophesied to them as aforesaid.

V. 24-29. A small remnant continued in the land under Gedaliah after the desolations of Jerusalem; and, notwithstanding all their crimes and miseries, they flattered themselves that they were entitled to the inheritance of the whole land. The promise of it had been made to Abraham when he had no children; yet his posterity had talking of him, or against him, wherever they met together. He was their constant topic, and it was their recreation to animadvert on him, or to ridicule him. But he would perhaps never have known it; had not the Lord seen it good, that he should reprove them in his name for it. They invited each other to come and hear the word of the Lord from him; and they came and sat before him with the same apparent seriousness, as the most pious people could do: they gave him a patient and apparently an attentive hearing; yea, they professed much love to him and his doctrine: but their hearts were possessed by covetousness; their leading affections and desires went forth after riches: they loved their money more than either God or man, the prophet, his word, or their own souls: and therefore they would not part with one gainful sin, for all that he could say; but would rather cavil at it or ridicule it. Indeed his voice and manner, his graceful elocution, cogent arguments, or apt illustrations, rendered him to them “as a very lovely song of one that had a pleasant voice and could play well on an instrument;” (in which the sound is commonly more attended to, than the meaning of the words sung); but they did not receive his words as a message from God, with a reverential and obedient faith; as it appeared from their subsequent conduct. But when the preceding prophecies, concerning the total desolations of the land, were accomplished, as they certainly would be; they would know, that he was not merely “a sounding brass, or tinkling cymbal;” but that a prophet of the Lord had been among them, whose words would be verified in the ruin of all that despised or disobeyed them.— ‘They came to hear thee for their entertainment, not for their edification, as many go to hear famed and eloquent preachers. St. Augustine tells us, that he himself was such an auditor of St. Ambrose, before he was converted. —I heard him diligently when he discoursed in the congregation: but not with that application of mind which I ought to have done: but I came rather out of curiosity, to know whether his eloquence was answerable to that opinion the world had of him. I was very attentive to his style, and charmed with the sweetness of his delivery; but had little value or concern for the subjects he treated of.’ (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20.

How much wiser are men in their temporal, than in their spiritual and eternal concerns! They set watchmen to guard their houses from robbers or conflagrations; and centinels to give warning of the approach of the enemy: and they best approve of those who are most quick sighted and vigilant, who see the danger at a distance and give the most decisive alarm; and he who should not give warning, would be deemed of man, as well as of God, accessory to the death of those who were slain through his neglect. But in the concerns of God and eternity, where the appointed watchmen are infinitely more concerned to be faithful, and to give the alarm in the plainest manner; they are sure to give offence to numbers, if they obey their Master's commands! When they cause the trumpet to give so certain a sound, that every sinner is made to feel himself to be the wicked man, who is “warned to flee from the wrath to come;” and when the terrors of the Lord are so placed before men's eyes, that they tremble at the prospect of eternal damnation, great will be the indignation and opposition excited against them. The most blind, drowsy, greedy, dumb watchman, that can be found, is preferred by an immense majority, to one that is thus awful in his warnings, and close in his application to their consciences: they are ready to say to their teachers, “Speak smooth things, prophesy deceits, cause the Holy One of Israel to cease from before us:” and any one of Ahab's lying prophets will be more acceptable, than Michaiah the prophet of the Lord, whom they hate, because he always prophesies evil concerning them!—We cannot then “be men-pleasers and the servants of Christ:” but the faithful watchman alone will deliver his own soul; they who perish from under his ministry, will have none to blame but themselves; and he will doubtless have many seals to his ministry, to be his joy and crown in the day of Jesus Christ: whilst the unfaithful watchman will be condemned as the murderer of all those who perish in their sins, through his negligence, flatteries, and lies. We that are ministers should frequently meditate on these subjects, and state them to our hearers: that they may understand on what ground we stand, and on what principles we act; and perceive, that we must be plain and faithful, if we would either “save ourselves or those that hear us.” But when ungodly men are determined to continue in sin, they will be very ingenious in devising some shadow of a reason for their most unreasonable conduct: and they will endeavour to fasten a charge of inconsistency on those who declare the whole counsel of God: they will pervert the most humiliating truths into a quietus to their consciences, and an excuse for their sloth and lusts; as if God were the Author of their sins, because he is the Giver of every good and perfect gift! Thus they rush out of presumption into a kind of desperation, which is often no more than a flimsy covering of downright infidelity; and they pretend that it is of no use to repent, or pray, or use the means of grace, because it is decreed that some sinners, (they cannot know who,) shall be left to themselves, and perish in hardened impenitency and unbelief! It is hard to say, whether such men are more desirous of deceiving themselves, or satan of deceiving them. But surely it proves a strong determination of mind to unbelief: when the Lord declares and confirms it with an oath, that “he hath no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but rather that he should repent and live,” that men will not believe him: but instead of attending to his pressing exhortation to turn from their evil ways; as if they were in love with death and damnation, to employ themselves in multiplying cavils and objections, which only tend to charge God with injustice, and are constructive blasphemy. For he who can do all other things, hath declared that it is impossible for him to lie, to do injustice, or to deny himself. Let us then bless his holy name, for the provisions of his grace and the security of his word, which assure the true penitent of complete forgiveness and eternal life; and let us also study to profit by his warnings to the righteous, not to trust in their righteousness and commit iniquity; and then we shall see cause to bless his name for these also. "Blessed is he that feareth always;" but they who so confide in the promises made to God's people, and so presume themselves to be of that number, as to be emboldened to commit iniquity, convert the very mercy and truth of God into "a savour of death," and, an occasion of condemnation to their souls: whilst they, who so fear the threatenings of the law, denouncing the sinner's death and damnation, as to take warning from it to repent and turn from all their sins, change that most awful curse into "a savour of life" to their souls. But such penitents always "do works meet for repentance;" and whilst they trust only in God's mercy through Jesus Christ, they conscientiously make restitution, as far as they are able, for all the injustice and robbery that they have committed; they walk in the ordinances of God and his statutes of life, without returning to the practice of iniquity: they "do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God;" and they shall surely live, and not die. Instead therefore of listening to the suggestions of the devil, of wicked men, or of our own evil hearts, as if the Lord's ways were not equal, let us condemn our own ways before him as unrighteous, and seek that "repentance, which is unto salvation not to be repented of;" let us watch against all hypocrisy, and reject every temptation to apostasy, or to pride and self-confidence: and, "building up ourselves in our most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Ghost, let us keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

V. 21—33.

It is a peculiar mercy in times of public calamity, for the Lord to open the mouths of his faithful ministers, and to give them a door of utterance; that they may teach the sufferers how to find comfort under their afflictions, and to derive benefit from them. But how inveterate are the selfishness and presumption of ungodly men! They can rejoice in the misery and death of multitudes, and even of their nearest relations, if they have expectations of being enriched by them! They often claim an interest in the peculiar blessings engaged to true believers; whilst their whole conduct as evidently proves them, the enemies, as Abraham's faith and obedience proved him the friend of God! And they can call this groundless presumption, strong faith! when the whole testimony of God declares them to be the children of the devil, entitled to all the threatenings, and to nothing else! For, however men may deceive themselves with vain words, adulterers, thieves, liars, slanders, covetous persons, and such like; have no inheritance in the promised land; because "for these things the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience." Wherever such men seek shelter, evil pursueth them; and they will assuredly perish because of all their abominations. But however unexceptionable the conduct and scriptural the doctrine be, of that man of God who constantly affirms such truths, he will be sure to be persecuted, at least with the scourge of the tongue; and it is generally well for faithful ministers, that they do not hear the contemptuous, malicious, and hard speeches, which ungodly men use of them behind their backs; for it would tend to exasperate or to discourage them. Such persons, however, should remember, that the Lord notes down all the words, which they speak by the walls or the doors of their houses; and considers them to be effusions of their contempt and enmity against him. (Jude 14, 15.) And their malice and scorn are aggravated by hypocrisy, when they come amongst God's people, to sit and hear his word, on purpose to quarrel with it or ridicule it; as Satan came among the sons of God, to obtain permission to do Job mischief. But indeed various corrupt motives induce men to frequent the places where the word of God is most faithfully preached. Many, who seem to come with alacrity and to hear with attention, are brought by direct enmity, that they may find somewhat to object to or oppose; and they even persuade others to accompany them, that they may join in the same profane opposition. Far more come out of curiosity. Some to exhibit themselves, to form connexions, to please their friends, or to establish a reputation. Others make a religion wholly of hearing; and suppose themselves excellent Christians, because they attend on faithful preachers, commend their sermons, and with their mouth show much love to the men and their messages: whilst they will not practise what they hear, but their hearts are wholly turned into covetousness. Others have a taste for ingenuity, elocution, or graceful delivery; and they find out preachers who have talents of this kind; and hearing them is their amusement, instead of a concert or an opera; especially at those leisure-hours when no other places of recreation are open. Thus even the gifts, as well as the faithfulness, of ministers, become a savour of death to those who hear and are delighted with their words, as "with the very lovely song of one, that hath a pleasant voice, or can play well on an instrument," but will not do them. It often happens, however, that they who come at first from such carnal motives, are afterwards brought to a better sense of things, and become doers as well as hearers of the word. So that the minister may be encouraged to be faithful and instant in preaching the word; without anxiously inquiring what brought his auditory together; and then whether men will hear, or forbear, they will know by the event, that a servant of God hath been among them; and he will be received at last by his Judge, with, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

2 Son of man, prophesy against ^a the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds; ^b Woe be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds ^c feed the flocks?

3 Ye ^d eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ^e ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock.

4 The ^f diseases have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye ^g sought that which was lost; ^h but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them.

5 And ⁱ they were scattered, ^{*} because there is no shepherd: ^k and they became meat to all the beasts of the field, when they were scattered.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 2-6. (Notes, &c. Is. lvi. 9-12. Jer. xxiii. 1-4.) Jerusalem was destroyed, the land desolated, and the Lord's flock scattered or destroyed; and the wicked shepherds were about to be called to account as the principal criminals who had occasioned so great an evil. "The shepherds of Israel," signifies their rulers and teachers; their kings and princes, priests and prophets, scribes and elders. The duty of the shepherd is to feed the flock, and to make that his principal object: but they were only careful to feed themselves. They had eaten the fat, or the milk of the flock, clothed themselves with the wool, and killed the fattest of the sheep, without regarding what became of the rest. They made every advantage they could from their offices; they exacted their tributes and taxes, their tithes and perquisites, with great earnestness; and they oppressed, and even destroyed the people to enrich themselves: but they bestowed no pains to provide for the welfare of the state, or of the souls of those intrusted to them. They resembled those shepherds, who utterly neglect the weak and sickly of the flock, and leave them to die without attempting their recovery; who, if any have their bones broken or are wounded, do not bind them up; and if any are driven away by robbers or wild beasts, or wander from the fold, never seek to bring them back: but treat them with great cruelty, and are more like ravening wolves, than careful tender shepherds. Thus the rulers of Israel had neglected to rescue the oppressed, to relieve the destitute, to remedy grievances, to provide properly for the public safety, to redeem those that had been driven into captivity, or to encourage the return of such as had taken refuge among idolaters. Their teachers also were equally negligent of their souls: they neither encouraged the weak and wavering; nor attempted to remove their error, ignorance, or wickedness, by wholesome instructions, counsels, and examples; nor reclaimed those that were turned aside to idolatry: but they employed their power in exacting upon the people, and made their sacred office a pretence for the most cruel oppressions and persecutions. By these means the people were scattered from the temple, as abhorring the sacrifices of the Lord: and from Jerusalem and Judah, to escape the tyranny of their rulers; and so became as sheep without a shepherd. And by the impolicy, impiety, and wickedness of their leaders, and the fatal effects of their bad use of their authority, they were at length given up to be a prey to the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and other nations, to be destroyed or carried into captivity; so that in the event the land was utterly desolated, and the Lord's flock, his visible Church, was left to wander on the dark mountains of the heathen, and was scattered over the face of the earth. This was equally applicable to the rulers, priests, and scribes in the days of Christ, and to the subsequent doom and condition of the Jewish nation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7-10. For the crimes before charged on the shepherds of Israel, and here again repeated, the Lord declared himself to be against them, and threatened to require of them the flock which he had committed to them, and which had been ruined by their fault. He would discharge them from their office, and deprive them of all the emoluments of it; and as they would not feed, so they should not be allowed to devour the flock. The descendants of David were from this time excluded from the temporal kingdom; the family of Aaron and the tribe of Levi were at length laid aside from their sacred functions; and numbers, both of magistrates and teachers, were entirely de-

11 ¶ For thus saith the Lord God; Behold ^a I, even I, will both ^b search my sheep, and seek them out.

12 * As a shepherd seeketh out his flock, in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places, where they have been scattered ^c in the cloudy and dark day.

13. And ^a I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, ^b and feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country.

14 I will ^a feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be: ^d there shall they lie in a good fold, and in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel.

15 I will feed my flock, and ^e I will cause them to lie down, saith the Lord God.

16 I will ^f seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick: ^g but I will destroy the fat and the strong; ^h I will feed them with judgment.

17 And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ⁱ I judge between [†] the cattle and cattle, between the rams and the [‡] he-goats.

18 Scemeth it ^a a small thing unto you ¹ to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must ^b tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet?

19 And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet; and they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet.

20 Therefore thus saith the Lord God unto them; ^a Behold I, even I, will judge between the fat cattle and between the lean cattle.

21 Because ^a ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad:

22 Therefore ^a will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and I will judge between cattle and cattle.

privied of power to oppress the people and enrich themselves. I will require a severe account of their kings and princes, priests and prophets, of the damage my people have sustained through their ill management; and I will deprive them of that honour and pre-eminence which they have made such an ill use of; as I have already displaced Zedekiah, and the princes and priests, and others that were in authority under him.' (Lowth.)

V. 11--16. The Lord having denounced sentence on the shepherds of Israel, next intimated his merciful intentions towards the scattered flock. These he would search for and find out, wherever they were. As the shepherd, when his flock has been scattered by wild beasts, gathers them together as soon as he can; and having numbered them to see how many are still wanting, he spends the day in seeking for them and bringing them back: so the Lord would seek out his sheep, which had been dispersed by the Chaldeans, in that dark and cloudy day when they besieged and took Jerusalem. He would gather them from all countries, whither they had been driven as exiles and captives: he would bring them to their own land, and there perform towards them every part of the Shepherd's office. But at the same time he would punish their proud oppressors, and feed them with judgment, distinguishing betwixt them according to their characters, as it is afterwards declared. Doubtless this primarily referred to the restoration of the Jews from captivity, and their re-establishment and prosperity in their own land: and it was typical of the good Shepherd's tender care of, and kindness to, the souls of his people and to his Church in every age even to the end of the world. (Marg. Ref.) 'But it seems to look further, even to the general restoration of the whole nation, which most of the prophets foretel shall come to pass in the latter days.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) The express promises here given, that JEHOVAH himself will feed his flock, in the predicted times, compared with the language of the New Testament concerning Christ, our good, and great, and chief Shepherd; contains an unanswerable argument in proof of his Deity, as one with the Father.

V. 17--22. The whole nation seemed to be the Lord's flock; yet they were of very different characters: but he knew how to distinguish betwixt them, "as the shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." The rams and he-goats, or the fat and strong, denoted the rich and powerful, the proud and self-sufficient, the wise and learned of this world. These had got possession of the best estates, and lived in magnificence, luxury, and sensuality: and not contented with this, they would not suffer the poor to use their leavings in comfort; but continually harassed them with usurious exactions and impositions, with suits and prosecutions, and by every means reduced them to the most abject penury and misery: as if strong and fat cattle, the rams and he-goats, having eaten up the best of the pasture and drunk the deep waters; should wantonly tread down and spoil the residue of the pasture, and muddy the water;

23 And ^a I will set up one Shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even ^b my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their Shepherd.

24 And ^a I the LORD will be their God, and my servant David ^b a Prince among them; I the LORD have spoken it.

25 And ^a I will make with them a covenant of peace, ^b and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land; ^c and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods.

26 And I will ^a make them and the places round about ^b my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be ^b showers of blessing.

27 And ^a the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall ^a know that I am the LORD, ^b when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that ^c served themselves of them.

28 And ^a they shall no more be a prey to the heathen, ^b neither shall the beasts of the land devour them; but they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid.

29 And ^a I will raise up for them a Plant ^b of renown, and they shall be no more ^c consumed with hunger in the land, ^d neither bear the shame of the heathen any more.

30 Thus shall ^a they know that I the LORD their God am with them, and that they even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord God

31 And ^a ye my flock, the flock of my pasture, are men, ^b and I am your God, saith the Lord God.

that the other cattle might starve, or be forced to feed on dislishing and unwholesome food. This may also be applied to the corrupting of the fountains of religious instruction by the scribes and priests, who "rendered the word of God of none effect, through their traditions," or those false glosses which they hired the false teachers to put upon it. But the Lord intended to plead the cause of the poor, the fatherless, and the widow, against their rich and proud oppressors: that the fat cattle might be led to the slaughter, and the lean possess the pasture. The former had used all their superior power to annoy and plague the latter; so the Lord would save them from their hands, and execute judgments upon them. (Marg. Ref.)

Seemeth, &c. 'This reproof may fitly be applied to those great persons who take no care that the poor may enjoy their benefit of their superfluities; but rather let them be thrown away and perish, than they will be at the trouble of seeing them disposed of for the good of those that want.' (Lowth.) 'By good pasture and deep waters, is meant the pure word of God, and the administration of justice, which they did not distribute; to the poor till they had corrupted it.'

V. 23-31. 'Christ is elsewhere styled David, as being the person in whom all the promises made to David are fulfilled. The expression may also allude to David's first employment of a shepherd.' (Lowth.) 'This is evidently a prophecy of Christ, and of the most glorious times of his Church on earth. The Lord saved his ancient flock from oppressors and false teachers, and at length raised up among them, and set over them and his Church, that one good Shepherd, whom he had promised from the beginning. He was called DAVID, because he was descended from, and typified by, that favoured king of Israel: and because he was a Ruler and Teacher of his people after God's own heart, (Ps. lxxvii. 7, 72.) The word David signifies "Beloved;" and he is the well beloved Son of the Father, in whom he is well pleased. In him the Lord is indeed the God and Portion of his chosen flock; and this his Servant and Son is a prince among them, being "Head over all things to his Church." Through the blood of his cross the covenant of peace is made with all his willing subjects, who are the sheep of his pasture; and it is established on better promises than that made with the nation of Israel. It would tend much to the security of a flock of sheep, to have all ravenous beasts extirpated from the land: thus the Lord engaged effectually to defend his Church, in the days of this promised Shepherd, from all their enemies, who resemble lions, tigers, wolves, or subtle foxes: so that his sheep might dwell safely and rest comfortably, even in the most perilous places. For though the powers of darkness, persecutors, and seducers, have harassed the Church hitherto; yet they have not prevailed against it, nor against any true believer: and ere long Satan shall be chained up, and all persecution and antichristian corruptions shall be terminated. Under this good Shepherd the Church, and all those favoured spots where there are spiritual folds of his sheep, would be made a blessing to the places round about: their pastures would be regularly watered with the rain of heavenly grace; showers of blessings would descend upon their souls, while attending on divine ordinances; the numbers of believers would thus rapidly increase, and the grace and peace of the whole company of them would abound. This would especially be the case, when the Lord had broken the yoke of their oppressors, who had enslaved them for their own mercenary purposes: then the heathen would no more be suffered to prey upon them, nor persecutors to devour them; but they would dwell without danger or terror. The Lord also promised to raise up to them "a Plant of Renown;" this also means Christ; who, though infinitely excellent in himself, and adored by holy angels, was "as a tender plant out of a dry ground," in his incarnation, humiliation, and death; but springing up in his resurrection, ascension, and heavenly glory, he became greatly renowned on earth, by the spread of the Gospel through the nations. And being indeed the Tree of Life, bearing all the fruits of salvation, he yields spiritual food to the souls of his people, on which they 'feed in their hearts by faith with thanksgiving.' So that the true Israel shall not be destroyed by famine, or made ashamed among the heathen; as the nation of Israel has been.—This could have but a typical accomplishment in the return of the Jews from captivity under Zerubbabel and their subsequent prosperity. Even the success of the Gospel in the primitive times and the preservation of the Church hitherto, form only partial completions of it. But the destruction of antichrist, the calling of the Gentiles, the restoration of the Jews into the Church and to their own land, and the consequent peace and prosperity of the Church and of the world, fully answer to the energetic language of these predictions.

A prophecy against Edom, for their hatred of Israel, 1—15.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

No rank or office in the Church, or in society, can exempt men from the reproofs of God's word, when they neglect their duty and abuse the trust reposed in them; and if the shepherds of Israel, of the Lord's own appointment, feed themselves and not the flock, wo be unto them! Indeed too many rulers, even in Christian countries, seem entirely to have forgotten the end of their appointment; and have acted as if they had been advanced to authority, to gratify their own ambition, cruelty, avarice, luxury, or lust, at the expense of those whose welfare they ought to have sought in every action, as their great object, in connexion with the glory of God and the salvation of their own souls. So that, whilst they have utterly neglected to protect the poor and industrious from the oppressions of the rich; to redress public grievances, to provide for the destitute, and to guard the peace and prosperity of the community, they have awed men into submission by force and cruelty, and thus for a time silenced every murmur against their tyrannical measures, their oppressive taxes, and inhuman executions. Thus they have indulged the mean ambition of growing rich by impoverishing their subjects, and of governing over a company of abject miserable slaves with uncontrolled authority. Such attempts depopulate flourishing kingdoms, and either scatter their inhabitants, by driving them for refuge to other nations; or cause them to be cut off, by exciting insurrections, encouraging invasions, or making way for destructive wars. Though there should be no man able or willing to remedy these evils; yet the Lord will show himself against such shepherds; he will soon deprive them of their abused authority, and call them to account for all the mischief which their crimes have occasioned; and deliver the people from their mouth that they may not be meat for them. But when this negligence, avarice, and wickedness, are found in the pastors and rulers of the Church: when they feed themselves, but through sloth and ignorance take no care to feed the flock; when they are only intent upon obtaining and multiplying rich benefices, that they may eat the fat and riot in luxury; when they never attempt to instruct the ignorant, to reclaim the erroneous, to alarm the careless, to encourage the broken-hearted, the distressed, and tempted; to reform the profligate or restore the backslider; or in any ways to bring men to repentance, to faith in Christ, to establish peace and holiness of life: but when they domineer over men's consciences with force and cruelty, as if they were lords over God's heritage; and fleece and butcher the flock which he hath purchased with his blood: when they waste the Church by fierce persecutions or infect it with damnable heresies: when the sheep are scattered, because there is no shepherd, but a wolf instead of one; and so fall into divisions and errors, forsake the word and ordinances of God, and are seduced into impiety or infidelity: in this case the guilt of the shepherd is, and his punishment will be, most aggravated. All the souls, that perish through the default of such men, will be required at their hands; the Lord will be against them, as they are evidently enemies to him; they will be driven from their office with contempt and detestation; and stripped of all their honours and emoluments; and their flocks will be delivered from such devourers.

The Lord will take care, that none of his true sheep shall finally wander or be lost, through the misconduct of those who are idle shepherds and greedy dogs. He will either raise up for them shepherds after his own heart; or he will supply the want of them by his own care; and will both seek and find every one of them, and convey them to his fold rejoicing. Thus the incarnate Son of God came into this dreary wilderness to seek and save that which was lost: personally, in the days of his flesh, he went about seeking the lost sheep of the house of Israel; and by his apostles and his ministers ever since, he hath also gone to search them out all over the Gentile world. Wherever his elect people are scattered, in the days of their darkness and ignorance, he finds them out and brings them into his fold. He also comes to their relief in the dark and cloudy days of persecution and temptation; he heals their backslidings, leads them forth in the paths of righteousness, feeds them in the rich pastures of his ordinances, folds them under his omnipotent protection, and causes them to rest and repose their souls upon his love and faithfulness. He seeks those that wander, and brings back that which was driven away; he binds up the broken-hearted and heals the diseased. And ought not his ministers then to do the same? Surely none but hirelings will value the emolument or reputation of the ministry more than this good and useful work; and the true pastor will be ready to endure hardship, to bear reproach and persecution; and to spend and lay down his life for the same ends for which the chief Shepherd shed his precious blood. But, alas! how few in comparison have there been hitherto, who have laboured and suffered in this disinterested, self-denying, humble, patient, and zealous manner! How few are there, who thus keep themselves pure from the blood of all men! Of how many will the souls of multitudes be required by the chief Shepherd at his appearance, when his faithful servants will receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away! Even in this respect, "broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat;" and still it may be said, "All seek their own, and not the things that are Jesus' or Christ's." But there is as much difference in character, among professed Christians, as among those who bear the name and wear the garb of ministers. It seldom happens that the fat and the strong, the rich and prosperous, are the most flourishing part of Christian congregations: and the proud and self-sufficient are always the enemies of the true Gospel, and of true believers. Such men are the rams and the he-goats of the flock: they are ambitious of domineering in the church as well as in the world: and whilst they think no possession or indulgence too great for themselves, and no subsistence too mean and scanty for their poor brethren; the word of God also must be preached, and his ordinances administered, as best suits their convenience, interest, conscience, or humour! Thus, through their undue influence, the pasture is trodden down, and the waters are fouled: the good food of pure, experimental, distinguishing preaching, is changed for a more distant, polite, smooth, fashionable, and flattering strain; and the streams of sound doctrine are corrupted. And whilst they thus seem to eat up the good pasture, and to drink the deep waters, the poor in spirit, that relish nothing but the Bread and Water of life, are starved; for they cannot live upon such unwholesome provisions. Whilst we should properly guard against such persons, we must leave it to the Lord to judge betwixt cattle and cattle: and when he cometh to separate betwixt the sheep and the goats, (if not before,) he will destroy the fat and the strong, and feed them with judgment.

Our good Shepherd hath already ransomed his chosen flock, and is placed as a Prince over his people. His covenant of peace has been ratified with many: nor shall either temptation or enemy separate them from his love; but they shall dwell, and rest safely, even in this howling wilderness, pass securely through the valley of death, and sleep in his arms, as it were, in the silent grave. Yet the Church is still infested with roaring lions, and ravening wolves, and every evil beast, and is exposed to manifold persecutions; is yet as to many things in captivity, and is comparatively of small extent and exceedingly corrupted. We have therefore much yet to hope and to pray for in this behalf. In our several situations we should aim so to live and labour in faith and love, and so to watch unto prayer, that we may become blessings to all around us; and that showers of blessings may descend on our souls, and the congregations to which we belong. Our constant desire and prayer should be, that there may be showers of blessings in every place, where the truth of Christ is preached; that numerous converts may spring up on every side; that all who profess the Gospel may be filled with the fruits of righteousness; that the yoke of Satan, and of every antichrist, may be broken, and the Church delivered from all those who have made religion subservient to their personal or political interests: that Jews and Gentiles may be united in Christ Jesus, and form one Church; that every partition wall may be broken down, every corruption purged out, and every boundary removed; and that "the earth may be filled with the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." When thus the nations shall all become acquainted with the Plant of Renown, who both is the Feeder and Food of his people; famines and pestilences, as well as wars, will probably cease through all the earth: and it will be known in a most glorious manner, that the Lord is with his Church, and that they are his people and he their God. In the meantime let us admire, and rejoice in, his condescending love, who hath chosen us rebellious men to be the sheep of his pasture, and is become our Shepherd and Salvation: and let us "hear his voice, and follow him, and he will give us eternal life, and we shall never perish; neither shall any one ever pluck us out of his Almighty hands."

and thou shalt fall into the hands of those that will be as eager to shed thine: the words imply more than they express. (Lonth.) The blood of the Israelites, shed from hatred of God and his people, is especially meant.

V. 7, 8. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Cities, &c. The cities of Judah and Israel at that time lay desolate; but they were about to be rebuilt and replenished; the flourishing cities of Edom, on the contrary, would speedily be destroyed, and never return to their former condition. (Mal. i. 3, 4.) The Nabatheans, having driven the Edomites out of their ancient habitations, in the time of the Babylonish captivity, they settled themselves in the southern part of Judea, where they were afterwards conquered by Hyrcanus, and obliged to embrace the Jewish religion, and so became at length incorporated with that nation. (Prideaux.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The Edomites expected to get possession of the countries both of the Israelites and Jews, as living in the neighbourhood, or as allies for some time of the Chaldeans: and perhaps they were encouraged by some vague tradition concerning that land having been promised to the posterity of Abraham and Isaac; and concerning Esau, the elder brother having been supplanted by Jacob. This expectation seems to have excited their ardour in seeking the ruin of the Jews and in rejoicing over it. But the Lord, the Proprietor of the land, had dwelt there, in his temple, and by his ark and visible glory: he had given abundant proofs of his power, in putting the descendants of Jacob in possession of it and maintaining them in it: and though he had now for their sins given them into the hands of the Chaldeans: yet he reserved that holy land for their posterity, and the Edomites would not be able to deprive them of it.

V. 11. 'I will make my people see; that I have not quite cast them off, by avenging their quarrel upon thee.' (Lonth.)

V. 12, 13. The Edomites not only coveted the fertile inheritance of Israel, and entertained a family and national antipathy against them: but they also hated and despised them because of their relation to JERUSALEM. When they therefore saw the land desolated, and the people destroyed or carried captive, they reviled the mountains of Israel, and thus blasphemed God, as if he had been unable to keep possession; and they boasted and gloried, as if the God of Israel had been overcome, as well as the nation of Israel.

V. 14. 'When I shall restore other nations, conquered by the king of Babylon, to their former prosperity, thou shalt still lie waste and desolate. The Edomites never recovered their country, after the Nabatheans had expelled them.' (Lonth.) Perhaps the land of Israel is meant. When the whole land of Israel should rejoice, as being replenished, the land of Edom would be rendered desolate.

V. 15. Idumea. Or Edom, as it is in the Hebrew.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of fatal consequence for parents to teach their children resentments or enmity against others; and still more so to instil into them prejudices against the Church of God: for these seeds will spring up and yield most pernicious fruit, after they have gone down to the grave. The wrath of God is loudly proclaimed against those, that have perpetual hatred to his people; and who take advantage of their calamities to insult over them and oppress them. They who do not hate blood, may be induced to shed it in ambitious wars and cruel persecutions, or by suitable temptations; and then blood will pursue them, or even a more dreadful punishment. The Lord himself will punish the crimes of ungodly professors of his holy religion, and chastise his offending children: but he will let his enemies know that he dwells in his Church, notwithstanding all her sins and sufferings: and when they think to gratify their malice, envy, or avarice, by oppressing and spoiling his worshippers, he will cease to afflict them, and make his

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1. The whole land was at this time uninhabited: but the Lord had a peculiar favour to it; and the prophet was ordered to address himself to the mountains of Israel, as the most conspicuous parts of the land. This might be meant as a reproof to such as refused to hear his word: but it was a great encouragement to those who regarded it, and assured them that God had mercy in reserve for them.

V. 2. 'The Idumeans made their boasts, that they should soon become masters of the mountainous parts of Judea, where the ancient fortresses were placed, which commanded all the rest of the country. To the same sense, we are to understand the expression of "riding on the high places of the earth;" (Deut. xxxii. 13.) "that is, taking possession of the fortresses or passes which command the rest of the country." (Lenth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The vain talkers among the heathen derided the pretensions of Israel, concerning a divine and exclusive right to the land of Canaan; as well as the language of the sacred writers, in calling it the glory of all lands, and the Lord's holy mountain. Whereas it now lay desolate, uncultivated, profaned, and seized upon by idolaters. Nor did JEHOVAH interfere to make good his claim, in behalf of his people: and they therefore thought that it might more properly be called an infamous than a glorious land.

V. 5. Surely, &c. This expression seems equivalent to the more general form, by which the Lord swore by himself, "As I live," &c. In burning jealousy for the honour of his name, which had been thus insulted by his enemies, he had spoken against them, and determined to put them to shame and to take vengeance on them; especially on the Edomites, who considered the land of Israel already their own possession; and who rejoiced exceedingly over the sufferings of the Jews, both from covetousness, and the malice and enmity of their despicable hearts; and they aided the Chaldeans to cast them out, that the land might be a prey unto them. (7.)

V. 8. At hand, &c. The predicted seventy years of the captivity were wearing away; and the time would soon arrive for the Jews to repossess and cultivate their own land, and to eat the fruits of it. 'If we suppose the words to relate to the general restoration of the nation:

 wherewith they had polluted it:

 the countries: ^s according to their way, and according to their doings, I judged them.

20 And when they entered unto the faned my holy name, when they said to not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for mine holy name's sake, which ye the longest distance of time, that the things of this world can extend to, is but a moment compared with

V. 10. The mercy, here promised, would be shown to Israel, in the most comprehensive sense, and not to Judah exclusively.

V. 11. Do better, &c. The outward state of the Jews was never so prosperous after the captivity, as it had been before that catastrophe: we must therefore understand this of their preservation from idolatry, and their adherence to the worship of God; and especially of the coming of the promised Saviour. Many interpreters think, that these predictions refer also to a future return of the Jews to their own land, when converted to Christ: and then indeed the Lord will do better unto them and their land, than at their beginnings.

V. 13-15. The Canaanites had been extirpated by Israel; and Israel had been destroyed or driven out by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and by sword, famine, and pestilence: the heathen, therefore, who probably were pleased to find a sermone ^r contrariety between the Jewish Scriptures and these facts, represented the good land as unwholesome, unfruitful, and destructive of its inhabitants: yet they were ready to take possession of it for themselves! But the Lord declared that he would replenish the land, and not suffer it any more to be desolated, as it had been during the Babylonish captivity; and that he would not any more give the heathen occasion thus to reproach it. Though the whole land of Israel was not desolated after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, as it had been after that by the Chaldeans; yet the slaughter made among the Jews was far greater; and they were entirely driven out of the land, and have continued in a state of exile from it for above seventeen hundred years. It seems therefore unavoidable, but that we must refer the full completion of this prophecy to some future event: when the land shall again become fruitful, and be inhabited by the nation of Israel to the end of time.

V. 17. 'A person, under a legal pollution, was for-bidden to come within the courts of the temple, or attend upon God's worship there: so the defilements the Jews had contracted by their idolatries, and other heinous sins, rendered them unqualified to be his people, or to offer up any religious service to him.' (Lowth.)

31 Then ^a shall ye remember your own evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and ^b shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, for your iniquities, and for your abominations.

32 Not ^c for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord God, be it known unto you: ^d be ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel.

33 Thus saith the Lord God; In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities I will also cause you to dwell in the cities, ^e and the wastes shall be builded.

34 And the desolate land shall be till- ed, ^f whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by.

35 And ^g they shall say, This land that was desolate is become ^h like the garden of Eden; and the waste, and the desolate and ruined cities are become fenced, and are inhabited.

36 Then the heathen that are left round about you shall ⁱ know that I the Lord build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate: ^j I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it.

37 Thus saith the Lord God; ^k I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them; ^l I will increase them with men like a flock.

38 As the ^m holy flock, ⁿ as the flock of Jerusalem in her solemn feasts, so shall ^o the waste cities be filled with flocks of men: and they shall know that I am the Lord.

yet the Lord can easily render it more fruitful than ever; and thus silence the reproach before spoken of, (13-15.) Many understand this and some of the following verses, of the great success of the Gospel in the predicted times.

V. 31. (Note, xvi. 60-63.) If we consider this passage as a prediction of the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land; the iniquities, which they shall especially remember with self-abhorrence, must mean their obstinate rejection of the Messiah, and their long-continued opposition to his cause, and all their other sins as resulting from that unbelief. (Note, Zech. xii. 10-14.)

V. 32. The prophet repeats this, on purpose to check the vain presumption in the Jews, and confidence of their own merit; a fault they have been prone to in all ages. (Lowth.) The extreme care of the inspired writers, in using all means of keeping alive a sense of guilt, and exciting a spirit of deep contrition, even when delivering the most free and enlarged promises of rich mercy, is a most instructive subject of meditation, especially to the ministers of the Gospel.

V. 36. He declareth, that it ought not to be referred to the soil, or plentifulness of the earth, that any country is rich and abundant; but only to God's mercies: as his plagues and curses declare, when he maketh it barren.

V. 37. Though the Lord would do these things freely for his own name's sake, and not for any merit or excellency of the people, (as they were always disposed to imagine:) yet he would have them to plead this promise with him, inquiring about the time and manner of its accomplishment, and earnestly begging of him to perform it: and he intended to pour out the Spirit of grace and supplication upon them, that they might be excited thus to inquire of him to do it for them. (Notes, Zech. xii. 6-14.) Then Jerusalem and the cities of Judah would be replenished with multitudes of inhabitants, like those who thronged thither to the solemn feasts; rapidly increasing in number, as well as living harmoniously and inoffensively, like flocks of sheep. This may signify the increasing number of worshipping congregations, all over the land.

and in every part of the earth, in those happy days that were predicted. 'He will dispose their hearts to apply themselves to him by prayer, and will answer the petitions, for the fulfilling these his promises.' (Lowth.)

V. 38. Some understand by "the holy flock," the sheep and lambs designed for sacrifice at the solemn feasts: but perhaps the assembled worshippers are meant. (Ps. c. 3.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15.

The most sacred truths, ordinances, and works of God, and every person or thing which relates to him, are taken up in the lips of profane talkers; who divert themselves and each other, and gratify their pride and malice, by endeavouring to represent that as despicable and infamous which God hath pronounced holy, honourable, and excellent. Such scoffers triumph and boast upon every apparent success, as if they had swallowed up the Church, and she were become a derision and a prey to her enemies: and their alacrity and joy in their successful efforts against her are increased, when they can gratify their covetousness, as well as malice, by these spiteful persecutions. But if in this manner they provoke the Lord to jealousy, he will return upon them the contempt and affliction which they have caused to his people; and punish them for their impious and scornful words, as well as for their unjust and cruel behaviour towards his servants. For, though the truth and cause of God may be run down, they cannot be kept down: the mountains of Israel, however wasted, profaned, or forsaken, will again be peopled, cultivated, and rendered fruitful: yea, the Lord is with his people, who then can be against them? And the time is at hand, when he will purify and settle his Church, and replenish her with numerous converts, and do better for her than even in the beginnings of the Gospel-dispensation. Then will he silence the calumnies, cavils, and objections of the ungodly: every part of the word of God will appear to all men consistent with facts; and the whole history of mankind shall show the truth of the Scriptures, the excellency of our holy religion, and the happiness of the people of God.

V. 16—27.

When we consider the abominations that have prevailed in the visible Church, we shall not wonder that the Lord hath repeatedly put away one part or another of it, with abhorrence and indignation; but shall rather admire at his patience and mercy, in still maintaining his cause amidst such multiplied provocations: and when we compare his justice and holiness with our guilt and pollution, and recollect how we have defiled ourselves and all his good gifts, by our evil ways and doings we shall often be amazed, that he hath not ere this poured out his fury upon us, and punished us according to our deservings. But the glory of his own great name always supplies him with motives for doing good to his people: and even when he cuts off hypocrites and apostates, and severely corrects his offending children, he will not have his honour profaned among his enemies, by letting them wholly trample down his worshippers: so that he will render his cause triumphant in the event. Not that he will connive at the sins of those who are called by his name; for this would still more embolden the blasphemies of ungodly men: but he will save his people from all their sins: and when he separates them from the company of those that perish, he will also “redeem them from all iniquity, and purify them unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works.” Indeed he finds us all “foolish, disobedient, deceived, slaves” to divers lusts and pleasures, and polluted with those abominable things which he loathes and abhors: but when “the loving kindness of God our Saviour towards us is made manifest, he saves us by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he pours upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Lord.” These blessed influences, like purifying water, then bedew and cleanse all the powers of our souls; and our being cleansed from all filthiness, and from the love and power of every sin, and detached from idolatrous affections for every created object, proves our interest in the blood of sprinkling, and shows that our sins are forgiven. When the Lord speaks and says, “I will, he thou clean,” the leprosy of our depraved nature is cleansed: he who first created our souls can new-create them to holiness, now that sin hath marred their beauty and ruined their health. He gives all his believing people a new heart, and puts a new spirit within them: the heart of stone is then changed for a heart of flesh, and becomes susceptible of every holy affection: then they are influenced in a proper manner by his word and providence: and the blessed Spirit of God, dwelling in his new creatures, as a Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter, gently leads them to walk, with increasing liberty and delight, in all his ordinances and commandments.

V. 28—38.

Our God is ever ready to fulfil his most precious promises to every one who perceives his need of them, and their suitableness to his case, and who pleads them by prayer in the name of our glorious Advocate: and thus the most polluted and inveterate transgressor may become a humble, holy, and spiritual worshipper and servant of God; one meet to be numbered with his people, and to enjoy his favour as his all-sufficient and eternal Portion. And when the Lord thus saves men from all their uncleanness, he will supply all their wants, and cause every event to concur in doing them good. A humble disposition of mind, leading a man frequently to remember his evil ways with loathing and self-abhorrence, and cordially to confess his unworthiness of the least mercy, even whilst he expects the richest blessings from the abounding grace of God, is an essential and inseparable concomitant of the new heart and spirit bestowed on true believers. Nor is there any more decisive proof that a man is yet in his sins, than a disposition to justify himself, and to expect the divine favour as the reward of his own goodness. The Lord will make it known to all the heirs of salvation, and that in proportion to their growth in grace, that “boasting is for ever excluded,” that shame and misery are all that such sinners can deserve; and that they are saved to the praise of the glory of his grace and for the honour of his great name. This conviction prepares them for every duty on earth: and when they shall come to glory, it will induce them to cast their crowns before the throne, and to ascribe salvation to God and to the Lamb for evermore. In some of these promises, the Lord, as it were, passes by, and says to the sinner, “Wilt thou be made clean?” Ask me, and I will cleanse thee; and so waits to be inquired of by them to do these things for them; and to do them more and more perfectly for believers: others of them invite us to pray for the increasing purity, prosperity, and spread of true religion. He waits to be inquired of by his people to fulfil these prophecies, and to fill the earth with his holy flock and with the congregations of his saints. Let us then give ourselves unto prayer, and turn all these promises and predictions into petitions and supplications: and thus seek increasing holiness, fruitfulness, and comfort to our own souls, and expect more glorious times for the Church of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 1-10. The predictions of the preceding chapter, taken in their fullest sense, seemed very unlikely and almost impossible to be fulfilled, considering the ruined and dispersed state of Judah and Israel. The prophet was therefore shown in a vision, by what power and in what way they would be performed. Under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, he was carried in a vision into the midst of a valley full of human bones; like those places in which great battles had been fought and vast multitudes slain, who had been left unburied till the flesh was all consumed, and the bones were dried, divided, and scattered about. When he had gone round and carefully surveyed these bones, and found them very many and very dry; the marrow from within, as well as the flesh from without being utterly wasted; the Lord inquired of him "Whether these dry bones could live?" To which he answered with a proper mixture of humility and faith, "LORD, thou knowest." No created power could restore them to life: but if God should please to put forth his power, they might be raised from the dead and live. The Lord then ordered him to prophesy upon these bones; to predict their resurrection, to call upon them to hear his word, and to speak over them the promises that follow, concerning their being reunited, and restored to life, that they might know his power and Godhead. This would appear even a more hopeless service, than to prophesy the restoration of Israel to their ancient prosperity, or to preach to the most hardened sinners: yet he started no objections, but obeyed his orders. And whilst he was speaking, he seemed, in his vision, to hear a noise, and to see a great commotion among the bones; for behold, they were, so to speak, every one of them in quest of its kindred bone, and, under the divine direction and influence, each speedily found its proper place, and was jointed to those bones that belonged to the same body, till the whole were formed into a vast number of complete skeletons; and then sinews, flesh, and skin covered them, and they became entire human bodies, but without life. The prophet was next ordered to prophesy to the wind, and to command it, in the name of the Lord, to blow from the four quarters of the heaven upon these slain men, that they might live: and whilst he obeyed his orders, they were restored to life, and he was surrounded with a vast army. The wind seems to have been the emblem of the Spirit of God, the Author and Giver of life: and the same original word signifies both wind, breath, and the Spirit. This therefore represented the prophet's calling upon God by his Spirit to quicken these dead bodies, that by his power they might become living men. The whole vision was an instructive emblem of the power of God operating by means, which of themselves must be entirely inefficacious, and thus producing most stupendous effects.

V. 11. The dry bones, indeed, aptly represented the ruined and desperate condition of both Israel and Judah: yet the language which they used was that of unbelief mingled with impatience; second causes seemed to give them no prospect of deliverance; and they overlooked the great first Cause of all: they therefore considered the state of the nation to be as desperate as that of these dead bones.

21 And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, ^f I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land:

22 And ^g I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; ^h and one King shall be King to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all:

23 Neither ⁱ shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions; ^k but I will save them out of all their dwelling places, wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall ^l they be my people, and I will be their God.

V. 14. When Cyrus issued his proclamation, the Lord, as it were, opened the graves of the house of Israel; and when he stirred up their spirits to embrace the proffered liberty, he put his Spirit into them, that they might live; and their re-establishment in their own land evinced the truth of God in the prediction, and his power in its accomplishment. 'That principle of life expressed by 'breath or spirit, (9.) not excluding that new Spirit of 'grace, which God will at that time plentifully bestow 'upon them. The principle of grace is often spoken 'of as a higher principle of life, and the earnest of our 'heavenly inheritance.' (Louth.) The vision was evidently intended, in its primary meaning, to encourage the desponding Jews; and to predict both their restoration after the captivity, and also their recovery from their present long continued dispersions. But it was also a clear intimation of the resurrection of the dead; and it likewise represents the power and grace of God in the conversion of the most hopeless sinners to himself.

V. 15-19. The prophet was next ordered to take two sticks, or small pieces of wood, and to signify by writing, that the one was the emblem of Judah, and those of the other tribes that had joined themselves unto them under the government of the house of David; and that the other was the emblem of the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and the several tribes which formed the kingdom of Israel. These he was directed to join together, that they might become one stick in his hand. When he did this before the people they would conclude that he had some prophetic meaning in it, and inquire whether he would not inform them of it: and he was ordered to show them, that the Lord would unite the two kingdoms by his power, and in consequence of their union with him. Their disunion had greatly weakened them, and their furious contests had made vast havoc of both; and thus they became a prey to their common enemies. But it was here predicted, that they should be united and established together in the service and favour of God. This was partially accomplished after the Babylonish captivity; when all the Israelites, that returned with the Jews from Babylon, settled under the same government and formed with them one nation. But it is probable that there will hereafter be a more remarkable accomplishment of it. It may also be considered as an emblem of the union of the Jews, Israelites, Samaritans, and Gentiles in the Church of Christ, being all made one by their union with him, their common Head; and an intimation of a more entire harmony among professing Christians, than had yet taken place. 'Ezekiel foretold many things by signs; and the Jews were very inquisitive into the meaning of them: though sometimes their curiosity proceeded rather from a secret contempt of the prophet and his predictions, than a real desire of information.' (Louth.)

V. 20-22. 'Thou shalt place the sticks thus joined together before their eyes, as a visible token and pledge of the truth of what I enjoin thee to speak to them in the following words.' (Louth.) It is plain, that the times of the Gospel were here especially intended: for it was promised, that both Jews and Israelites should be gathered into their own land, and become one nation under one King, and that that King should be David (24:) but they were never governed, as one nation, by any king to whom the name of David could properly be given, from the time of the captivity to the coming of Christ, who is several times called David. (Marg. Ref.)

Transgressions. 'This expression comprehends in it, their being touched with a hearty compunction for their great sin of rejecting and crucifying the Messiah, their King and Saviour.' (Louth.)

V. 24. And, &c. (Note, xxxiv. 23—31. Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. This cannot possibly be interpreted of any events, that took place before the coming of Christ: and after his coming, the Jews were soon driven from their own land, and have never regained possession of it. Yet the language is so expressive, that it seems plainly to mean, that the Jews should dwell in Canaan under the rule of Christ, from the time intended, through all generations to the end of the world.

V. 26. 'God will be reconciled to them through Christ, and admit them into that covenant of peace, of which he is the Mediator.' (Louth.)

Set, &c. This signifies, that the Lord would establish his true religion and accepted worship, (of which the sanctuary had been so long the centre,) in Israel, when reinstated in the promised land. 'Here he promises his presence among them, by the graces of his Spirit and the efficacy of his word and sacraments.' (Louth.)

V. 28. The nations of the earth shall witness God's peculiar favour to Israel, and powerful interposition in behalf of that nation, according to his promise: and this probably will be the means of bringing them to believe the Scriptures, and to embrace Christianity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

As the Almighty power of God is engaged to perform his whole word; so our objections and doubts, arising from difficulties or apparent impossibilities, are the offspring of ignorance and unbelief. That omnipotent word, which once spake this fair creation into existence, and still upholds it; and which shall hereafter call forth from their graves the innumerable millions of the dead, to a life of endless happiness or misery, must be sufficient to remove all obstacles, and direct all purposes, that form a part of the divine plan. On this power ministers must absolutely depend when they preach the Gospel: for the state of those that are dead in sin and enmity against God, slaves to Satan and their own lusts, and habituated to various evils, is as desperate in itself, and they are as much without strength as these dry bones were: nor could any created power restore them to God and holiness. But the true minister has some experience of "the exceeding greatness of that mighty power which wrought in Christ, when he was raised from the dead," and which hath wrought and still worketh in every believer: and he knows it to be sufficient to soften the hardest and cleanse the most polluted heart. When he therefore considers the case of proud infidels and Pharisees, or of abandoned profligates and blasphemers; the Lord as it were asks him, Whether these dry bones can live? Whether they can be made his saints and servants? And his answer is, "Lord, thou knowest." If he please to work, the dry bones will live: nor can we make any exception to this rule, without limiting the power of our God. But though the work be wholly his; yet he commands us to use means: and if he ordered us to preach to the dry bones in a chamber, it would be our wisdom and duty to obey: and only pride and unbelief could start objections. If sinners then were as devoid of life and sense as the dry bones, we ought to preach to them, and to call on them to hear the word of the Lord, and to set before them his truths, invitations, and promises; warning, exhorting, beseeching, and persuading them to come to Christ for salvation; and to hope that God would powerfully work, whilst we were using the appointed means. But the incapacity of sinners, though equally entire, is of another kind: they are rational creatures, whose understandings, consciences, affections, and imaginations may be addressed, and who are capable of fears, hopes, and desires. Surely then we should be ready at the Lord's command to go to the highways and hedges, in order to invite and even compel men to come in, as far as arguments and persuasions can do it; to beseech rebels to be reconciled to God, and to command them to repent and believe the Gospel; accompanying all our endeavours with earnest prayers, that the Spirit of God may come and breathe on dead sinners, that they may live. Under this kind of preaching various effects will be produced: many will be made to tremble, and to inquire what they must do to be saved? And a great commotion will sometimes be excited among those who have been careless and secure: there will be a gathering of the people to hear the word, and to confer about the matters of religion: numbers will be induced to attend on the means of grace; and even those who eventually are converted, often do many things outwardly before they are actuated by a vital inward principle. We should indeed be careful not to rest in any thing short of true conversion; and we should warn the people not to settle in forms, notions, or external reformation: yet this shaking among the dry bones may encourage us to proceed, preaching earnestly, praying fervently, and waiting patiently: and we may hope in due time to see a large company of spiritual soldiers, warring under the banner of Christ, against sin, the world and the devil, raised up from those who before were dead in trespasses and sins. Let us also remember, that the same power is equally engaged to raise the Church from her lowest depressions, and our souls from the deepest discouragements; and to perform all that for us and ours, which is truly good for us. Our part is to use proper means, to wait and pray, and not to yield to discouragement, because of difficulties, as if our hope were lost, or we were cut off, when our trials are heavy, and our prospects gloomy. But let us look to him, who will at last open our graves and bring us forth to judgment, that he may now deliver us from sin, and put his Spirit within us, and keep us by his power through faith unto salvation; then we shall at last come forth victorious from all our conflicts, and for ever bless God for our present sharpest tribulations.

Nothing hath so hindered the success of the Gospel hitherto, as the divisions among professed Christians: and it requires the same power of God to unite discordant persons and parties, so that they may be one in his hand, as is requisite to raise his Church from the most discouraging situation. They who desire the prosperity, should labour and pray for the peace of Jerusalem: and in this sense especially. "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God." We have all one King and Shepherd, and are all one nation and family; nay, one body, as united to Christ our Head: how unnatural for us then to be as two armies, fighting against and weakening each other! Let us study "to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:" let us with one accord seek for divine grace, to keep us from any more defiling ourselves with our idols, detestable things, or any transgressions: let us pray that the Lord would in like manner cleanse his Church; and beg of him to continue it in the midst of us for evermore; and that he would also place it again among his ancient people the Jews, and vouchsafe it to all other nations of the earth: that this everlasting covenant of peace may be with them, as well as with us: that we may altogether be the obedient and happy subjects of the Son of David; and that the Lord may be our God, and we his people for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 2. 'The prophecy, contained in this and the following chapter, without question relates to the latter ages of the world, when the whole house of Israel shall return into their own land.—'Gog, the land of Magog; or "of the land of Magog." Magog was the son of Japheth. (Marg. Ref) From whence the Scythians are generally supposed to be derived. The Magd Tartars are still called so. By Gog and Magog, may most probably here be meant the Turks. —The land of Canaan has been, for several years, in the possession of the Turks. The people here called Gog, and their allies, will attempt to recover it again out of the hand of the Jews. This may, probably, occasion the war and victory here spoken of. The Septuagint takes the word Rosh, commonly translated chief, for a proper name: so they render the sentence thus; "The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal." 'Rosh, taken as a proper name, signifies those inhabitants of Scythia, from whence the Russians derive their name and original.' (Louth.) It is not indeed agreed what people or transactions are here predicted: but it seems evident, that they are not yet accomplished. Nothing occurred in the wars waged by the Syro-grecian kings against the Jews after the captivity, or in their conflicts with Antiochus Epiphanes, that answers to these predictions: and it is foretold, that these events would be fulfilled in the latter days. It is therefore probably supposed, that the accomplishment will be posterior to the conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land: and that the Turks, Tartars, or Scythians, from the northern parts of Asia, perhaps uniting with the inhabitants of some more

V. 10. The Lord foresees from ages and generations, every thought, good or bad, that will ever come into the mind of any of his creatures, and every purpose of their hearts; and all these infinitely numerous apparent contingencies form a part of his immense and glorious plan.

V. 11. The converted Jews will live in peace and holy confidence in God, without attempting to molest others, or fear of being molested: they will therefore have neither walls, gates, nor bars; and this will tempt these depredators to invade them.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) ^a These merchants, as soon as they heard of this intended invasion, came into Gog's camp, as to a market, to buy both persons and goods, which should come into the conqueror's power. Their chief merchants, who are described as so many princes, (Is. xxiii. 8.) are called lions, because of the injustice and oppression they too commonly practised in their commerce. (Louth.) ^b One enemy shall envy another, because every one shall think to have the spoil of the church.

V. 14. ^c As soon as the news of their being settled in their own country comes to thy knowledge, thou wilt certainly make preparations to invade them. (Louth.) southern regions, will make war upon the Jews, and be cut off in the manner here predicted. Gog and Magog are mentioned by St. John, (Rev. x. 8, 9.) It is probable that the inhabitants of the same regions are intended; but different events are evidently predicted: for that assault of Gog and Magog will follow the millennium, and happen just before the general judgment; but this rather refers to the times that will introduce the millennium. Gog seems to be the name of the prince, Magog of his land or people.

V. 4. The ruin of these formidable enemies is thus intimated, by the prediction of their assault. They will certainly be induced to make this formidable invasion: and then God will defeat it, as he did that of Sennacherib, by putting his hook in their jaws. (&c. (Marg. Ref.))

V. 6, 7. 'Gomer was Japheth's son, and Togarmah the son of Gomer; these are thought to be they that inhabit Asia Minor.' The Persians from the east, the Ethiopians from the south, the Moors from the west, and the Phrygians from the north, shall join with them in this onset. (Bp. Hall.) This is an ironical exhortation to Gog to make all possible preparation, and to use every precaution to defend himself and his army, and to insure victory: and it intimates, that God will thus gain the greater honour by his defeat.

V. 8. The expressions of this verse lead our thoughts far beyond the times of Antiochus Epiphanes; and the land of Israel having been "always," or perpetually, "waste," denotes a much longer desolation, than that of the Babylonish captivity.

16 And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel, ' as a cloud to cover the land ; * it shall be in the latter days, and I will bring thee against my land, ' that the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes.

V. 16, 17. The exact accomplishment of these ancient prophecies will turn to a testimony to the nations that shall witness them : and they will recollect, that thus it was written, and thus it had come to pass. ' This signal victory ' over Gog and his associates, shall be the means of bringing infidels to give glory unto me.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)—' The expressions here used plainly imply, that ' there was to be a succession of ages between the publishing of these prophecies, and this event foretold by them. (Louth.)

V. 19, 20. At the terror of the Lord's judgments upon the invaders ; all nature will be, as it were, thrown into convulsions at his presence, and concur in executing his vengeance on them.

V. 21—23. ' God's decrees are expressed by his speaking the word and giving out the command.' (Louth.) Some think that the Lord will send assistance to Israel, by the armies of Christian princes : in addition, however, to all external opposition, he will occasion discord among the invaders, and they shall destroy one another ; as well as perish by pestilence, hail-stones, fire, and brimstone.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the Lord most effectually works to promote his cause, and to prosper his church in unity and purity ; Satan will be most busy, (if permitted,) in exciting his servants, with combined efforts, to oppose it : and they who on other occasions are most hostile, often confederate to fight against his people. But, he whose all-seeing eye penetrates the deepest recesses of the human heart, through long series of ages, yea, from eternity ; and who foresees what things will come into men's minds, and what evil thoughts they will think, is equally able to disappoint their devices. In vain do men prepare for the defence and success of themselves and their companions, when the Lord is pleased to fight against them ; for " though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished."—They who enjoy the Lord's protection are safe, and may be secure, though they have no other defence. It is most atrocious to devise mischief against those who serve God, in quietness and honesty, and who are harmless, inoffensive, and unsuspecting. But the love of riches, and the hatred of God and holiness, incite men to the most base and destructive enterprises : and when any dwell securely, bad men soon know of it, and mark them as their prey. Hence, alas ! it is become necessary for those communities that desire peace, to learn and encourage war as a science and a trade ! All opposition to the cause of God will eventually tend to sanctify his great name, and to fulfil the writings of his ancient prophets ; and that in proportion as it is formidable. They, who love to terrify their neighbours, will be made to tremble at the power and indignation of the Lord. The whole creation will concur in the destruction of his devoted enemies : pay, they will help forward their own and each other's ruin, till they are driven by the tempest of his jealousy into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone ; and thus he will be magnified and sanctified upon all those who refuse to submit to him and serve him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIX. V. 2. Leave, &c. Or, "I will strike thee with six plagues." (Marg. xxxviii. 22.) It seems probable, that none of the invaders will escape the general destruction; but perhaps the inhabitants of Magog in general are meant. The vast army of Gog, led forth to invade Israel will almost empty the land, and the subsequent judgments of God, upon those that remain at home, will reduce them to the sixth part of the whole. (6.)

And I will, &c. The words may be better translated, "After I have caused thee to come up." &c. (Lonth.)

V. 6. Some terrible judgment will destroy those countries, whence the army of Gog was led forth; about the same time that the army itself shall be cut off. "They that dwell carelessly in the isles," may denote the allies of Gog before mentioned. (xxxviii. 5, 6, 13.) "I will send my fierce judgments upon the enemy of my Church; and upon those that being separated and guarded by the sea, live securely confident of their safety." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 7. "I will not suffer my name to be dishonoured any more; nor let it be said among the heathen, that I was not able to rescue my people out of the hand of their enemies." (Lonth.)

V. 8. This was predicted many hundred years before the event: yet the prophet spoke of it, as already come and done; to denote the certainty of it; and as seeing in vision its actual accomplishment. "The plague is fully determined in my counsel and cannot be changed." "It is the last and finishing stroke of God's justice upon the enemies of his Church." (Lonth.) That is, before the millennium. (Note, xxxviii. 2. Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. The language here used, seems to imply, that the army of Gog will be cut off by miracle, as that of Sennacherib had been: for the people are described, as going forth, not to fight and conquer, but merely to gather the spoil. The immense destruction of the invaders is illustrated by the (perhaps hyperbolical) circumstance of the weapons found among the slain, serving for fuel during seven years, at least to the inhabitants of the adjacent cities. But when it is considered how little fuel, comparatively, is needed in warm climates; we may even conceive of this being literally fulfilled. The Israelites, however, will neither reserve these weapons for their own use, nor form them into trophies of their victory: but use them for fuel. "In token that such a lasting peace should ensue, that there should be no more need of warlike preparations." (Lonth.) It is supposed, that this prediction will be fulfilled just before the millennium; at which happy period, "men shall every where beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not rise against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Notes, Is. ii. 1—5. R370. xx. 1—6.)

V. 23—29. These verses seem to refer to this and all the preceding prophecies, concerning the restoration and subsequent prosperity of Israel. They went not into captivity to Babylon, because the Lord was unable to protect them, or through any breach of his promise; but because of their transgressions, which provoked him to hide his face from them, and to leave them in the hands of their enemies. In like manner they were expelled from the land by the Romans, and continue in a captive or exiled state to this day; because they rejected and crucified Christ, and pertinaciously fought against his Gospel: and he hath dealt with them accordingly. But when he shall at length have mercy on the whole house of Israel, by converting them to Christianity for the glory of his own name; and when they shall have borne the shame of being cast off for their sins, while they dwell safely in their own land, and shall again be gathered into it: then the nations shall perceive his justice, truth, and goodness in his dealings with his people, and shall learn to know, worship, and serve him: and Israel also shall know the Lord their God, in a humbling spiritual manner, as revealed in and by Jesus Christ, whom they have so long rejected. At that time they shall all be gathered into their own land: and the Lord will no more hide his face from them, or leave them in the hand of their enemies, as he will have poured out his Spirit upon them, and thus made them his holy worshippers and servants. The return of a few Jews from Babylon, and their continuance, increase, partial reformation, and prosperity, till the days of Christ, followed by their present long continued dispersion, under the frown of God, and destitute of his Spirit, could in no wise answer to these predictions. We are therefore constrained either to explain them exclusively of the blessings conferred on the Church at large; or to conclude that some future events, exactly answerable to them, shall take place in respect of the nation of Israel: and this latter interpretation is far more consistent with the most obvious method of explaining the Scriptures.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The Lord will surely make all men, even the most careless and inveterate transgressors, know his holy name: either by the power of his righteous indignation, or by the riches of his mercy and grace: and he will at length silence every objection to his dispensations, and not suffer his holy name to be polluted any more. This time is at hand:

this is, as it were, already done: the day of which God hath spoken is about to be ushered in; his promises and judgments will soon be exactly accomplished: let us then go forth to meet him, and anticipate by faith and prayer the approach of his promised blessings to ourselves and to his Church. Speedily the weapons of war, which are so much in use all over the world, will be rendered needless. Indeed they might now be all burned, or buried in the depth of the sea, to the great benefit of mankind; and they would be thus disposed of, did not men more resemble Satan in pride, malice, and treachery, than the Lord in justice, truth, goodness, and mercy; and if they did not take more delight in robbing, murdering, or domineering over others, than in love and good works. Yet it is the common lot of spoilers to be spoiled and slaughtered, by those whom they seek to injure. After all the disturbance that is made by men of vast ambition or insatiable avarice, and after all their mighty expectations and achievements, a place of graves is all that the Lord gives them on earth; and sometimes even this is denied, that the indignities exercised towards their dead bodies may be an emblem of the contempt and misery to which their guilty souls are doomed in the invisible world. It is our duty to show a humane disposition even towards the most injurious: yet self-love may suffice to induce the survivors to bury the dead. It should therefore moderate our regard to these mortal bodies, and their decoration and indulgence, and our attention to external accomplishments in others, to consider, that commonly, in two or three days after death, the human body becomes too deformed a spectacle to be looked on without horror by those who used most to love and admire it. When the Lord is glorified in the ruin of his enemies, and in the good conduct and prosperity of his people, it becomes a day of great renown to them: but it is the chief renown of any land, when all ranks and orders of men concur in cleansing it from the filthiness of sin, which is far worse than any natural or ceremonial pollution whatever. This is a good work, which will require persevering diligence, that it may not be done superficially, but that search may be made into the secret recesses of iniquity, by persons severed for that service, and with the assistance of all that are able to give them information.

V. 17—29.

The most haughty and prosperous of sinners are only fattened for the slaughter, like the bulls and rams of Babylon: at length they will all be made a sacrifice to justice, for the display of the glory of God, before the nations of the earth: whilst the poor and afflicted people, that trust in him, shall certainly know and experience his power, truth, and love, in their timely deliverance and advancement. But even the professed people of God often fall into the hands of their enemies, or into divers and sore calamities; because they have trespassed against him, and he deals with them according to their uncleanness and their transgressions. And indeed, if true believers yield to temptation, and commit deliberate wickedness, the Lord will hide his face, and inflict sharp correction on them; and they will walk in darkness, and their enemies will seem to insult over them. But though they may thus be deserted, tempted, corrected, and distressed; yet they have a sure refuge in the Lord's mercy: for a season they bear their shame; till being truly penitent, he again bath mercy on them, for the honour of his own name; and then they dwell safely and comfortably under his protection, and none can make them afraid. For the name of God will finally be hallowed: his cause will be triumphant on earth, and in heaven: he will yet have mercy on the dispersed house of Israel, and gather them out of their captivity: and he will never finally hide his face from any of those on whom he hath poured out his sanctifying Spirit. But we must not expect to be wholly exempted from temptation, distress, and trouble, till we come to heaven: then we shall be filled with the Spirit of holiness, and behold the face of our God, without one frown or intervening cloud for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) The prophet had this vision in the most gloomy season of the captivity, twelve years before Jehoiachin was released from prison by Evil-merodach.

V. 2. (Note, i. 1.) The vision, contained in the remainder of this book, is allowed by commentators to be one of the most obscure in the sacred Scripture: so that it is not fully agreed what city, temple, and land were intended; or whether it had reference to former or to future times; whether it be understood literally or figuratively; whether it relate to the Church on earth, or that in heaven. Some think the following description of the temple was intended to show what Solomon's temple had been. (Notes, 1 Kings vi. vii.) others explain it of the second temple, and of the city, after they were rebuilt and arrived at their greatest prosperity. There can, indeed, be little doubt, that the grand outlines of the description were taken from Solomon's temple, with all the additions made to its courts and outbuildings in after ages; and that in many particulars it may be considered as a model of it, when destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. We may also suppose, that Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the other Jews, had respect to it, as far as circumstances would permit, in rebuilding the temple after the captivity. There are, however, several circumstances, which conclusively show, that something vastly superior to either the first or second temple was intended; and that the external description must be considered as a figure and emblem of spiritual blessings. This will appear, in many particulars as we proceed: but especially the dimensions of the temple, city, and land; and the division of the land to the prince, priests, and tribes; and the river of water springing from the threshold of the temple, enlarging till it reached the dead sea, and sweetening its waters; with the trees growing on the banks of the river, bearing fruit every month, cannot be literally interpreted, or made to accord with any thing which has yet taken place, (xlv. xlvii. xlviii.)—

'The general scope of Ezekiel's temple is, by giving a promise of restoring Solomon's to preserve the Jews from defiling themselves with idolatry during their captivity; and when the time of that should be expired, to encourage them to go home and rebuild their temple, and observe the laws and ordinances prescribed by Moses, for performing God's worship there; which yet was never to be equal to Solomon's in every respect, before the Messiah should come, whose Church should resemble Solomon's temple, in symmetry and beauty; in firmness and duration, in a regular, orderly, and decent worship of the true God; and in the manifestation of the divine presence, at first by the miraculous gifts of the holy Ghost, and ever since by the inward assistances, comforts, and protection of the same Spirit.' (Lowth.)—
The state of the Church, however, in that happy period which we are taught to expect, seems to be emblematically predicted. 'Nothing is more usual, than for the prophets to describe the state of the Christian Church, by representations taken from the Jewish temple and service.' (Lowth.) (Notes, Is. xlix. lv. lvi.) If we would judge of the propriety, with which those glorious days were predicted under such allusions; we must place ourselves in the situation of the pious Jews, when in captivity, who favoured the very dust and stones of their city and temple; and who could not well detach their ideas of the Church's prosperity, from that of the external splendour of the sanctuary; or conceive of more glorious times for the worship of God, abstracted from the expectation of a larger temple or city. It is probable that the more immediate accomplishment of the prophecy will be subsequent to the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, the destruction of Gog and Magog, and the pouring out of the Spirit mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter: and it will perhaps continue through the thousand years, during which Satan will be chained up in the bottomless pit. But whether there will be any external forms, analogous to those here predicted, cannot be determined; though in some respects it seems very improbable: it is, however, absurd to attempt laying down rules for Church-government, discipline, or modes of worship, from so obscure a vision: seeing men of lively imaginations and contrary sentiments may, perhaps, with equal plausibility, accommodate it to their systems. In general the vision seems to have been intended, both to remind the Jews of what they had lost by their sins, and so to lead them to repentance; and to encourage their hopes of the final prevalence of that cause, which was at that time so greatly depressed.

A very, &c. Mount Moriah is called "a very high mountain," because it represents the seat of the Christian Church, foretold by the prophets, that it should be "established on the top of the mountains." Mount Moriah lay southward of the hill of Zion, though northward of the lower part of the city, commonly called Jerusalem. (Lowth.) The very high mountain, however, is not said to have been Moriah or Zion. The prophet saw on the south, the frame, or plan, of the city, which would at length be builded, and which he afterwards repeatedly mentioned; though he was directed first to describe the courts and the temple.

V. 3. A man, &c. Many suppose this man to have been the eternal Son of God, anticipating his incarnation by appearing in human form. He is the Builder, as well as the Foundation and Corner-stone of the spiritual temple:

and his appearance as brass might denote his durable stability and glory, in his person and mediatorial government: yet, as the glory of God, in Christ, has been shown to be the scope of the introductory vision, (Notes, i. x. and as the same glory appeared to the prophet in this vision, when the man here spoken of was present, (xliii. 1-6:) it may be questioned, whether he were not a created angel, (Rev. i. 15.) The use of the line was to measure the land; and of the reed to take the dimension of the buildings. (Lowth.) These may denote his revealed word, or secret decrees, according to which he will regulate every thing that relates to the doctrine, worship, and practice of his Church.

V. 4. He proposes to the prophet two duties, always necessary: that he should diligently learn from God, and faithfully deliver what he had received.

V. 5. A wall. This wall is supposed to have surrounded the temple and all its out-buildings; and it may be an emblem of the Church's separation from the world, and its security under the divine protection. The reed, with which the prophet's Instructor measured, is computed to have been nearly four yards long: though some think that the ordinary Jewish cubit is meant, and distinguished from that which was used in Chaldea; and that the reed was not much above three yards long. The outward wall is stated to have been one reed in breadth, or thickness, and one in height.

V. 6. The gate of the outward court, in which the Israelites worshipped, seems to be intended. The Angel passes by the court of the Gentiles, and does not measure it: (Rev. xi. 2;) perhaps signifying, that the multitude of the nations, flowing into the Church, could not be comprised in any measure or number. The word translated threshold, signifies the lintel, or upper part of the door case, as well as the lower threshold. (Lowth.) These were equal in dimensions to the thickness of the wall.

V. 7. The entrance into the outward court seems to have been through a porch, with doors at both ends; and on each side of this porch were three small chambers, or rooms, a reed square in size, with a passage of five cubits between them. These rooms were for the use of the porters, that took care of the several gates, which led to 8 He measured also the porch of the gate within, one reed.

7 xlv. 19.

9 Then measured he the porch of the gate, eight cubits; and ⁷ the posts thereof, two cubits; and the porch of the gate was inward.

10 And ² the little chambers of the gate eastward were three on this side, and three on that side; they three were of one measure: and the posts had one measure on this side and on that side.

11 And he measured the breadth of the entry of the gate, ten cubits; and the length of the gate, thirteen cubits.

* Heb. limit, or bound

12 The * space also before the little chambers was one cubit on this side, and the space was one cubit on that side: and the little chambers were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side.

13 He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another: the breadth was five and twenty cubits, door against door.

14 He made also posts of threescore cubits, even unto the post of ^a the court round about the gate.

15 And from the face of the gate of the entrance, unto the face of the porch of the inner gate were fifty cubits.

16 And there were † narrow windows to ^b the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about, and likewise to the ‡ arches: and windows were round about § inward: and upon each post were ° palm-trees.

17 Then brought he me into ^d the outward court, and, lo, ^e there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about: ^f thirty chambers were upon the pavement.

18 And the pavement by the side of the gates over against the length of the gates, was the lower pavement.

‘the temple.’ (1 Chr. ix. 13—24. xxvi. 12—18.) ‘The inward threshold, at the further end of the porch, looking into the first court, was of the same size with the outer one.’ (Louth.)

V. 8. Or. “He even measured,” &c.

V. 9. “The porch of the gate,” and “the posts thereof,” seems to have been a portico, or pent-house, on the inside of the entrance beyond the chambers, projecting eight cubits, and supported by posts or pillars, two cubits in circumference; which carried off the wet, and served for shade and shelter, to those who entered into the outward court.

V. 10. (Note, 7.) ‘The fronts of the doors, belonging to each row of chambers, were of the same size.’ (Louth.)

V. 11. The width of the gate, or door, at each end of the entrance, (perhaps including the door-posts,) was ten cubits; and the height thirteen cubits, or about twice the height of the wall.

V. 12. A space of a cubit in width, seems to have been separated by some rail or fence on both sides, from the passage, before each of the little chambers; to keep off the throng of those who entered into the court, and perhaps for a passage to those who occupied the rooms. (7.)

V. 13. The whole arch of the east-gate, measured from the southern extremity of one room to the northern extremity of the opposite room, was twenty-five cubits; including the dimensions of the two rooms, (or twelve cubits;) the spaces before the rooms, (or two cubits;) and the breadth of the entrance, (ten cubits.) This makes twenty-four cubits; and the other cubit seems to have been taken up by the walls of the rooms, inward, towards the entrance. The doors of the rooms on each side the entrance seem to have faced each other.

V. 14. The word, rendered posts and post is by many supposed to mean pent-houses. Perhaps, the verse may signify, that the pent-houses to the chambers, and within the porch toward the court, when the several measures were added together, amounted to sixty cubits in extent. — The angel is said to have made, what he delineated before the prophet.

V. 15. ‘The whole length of the porch, from the outward front, unto the inner side which looks into the first court, was fifty cubits. Twelve, the thickness of the wall at each end; eighteen for the three chambers on each side; and ten cubits for the space between the chambers; allowing the same space between the chambers on each side, and the two walls.’ (Louth.)

V. 16. ‘Every one of the little chambers had a narrow window to it, toward the inside of the gate where the passage was; and so there was over the side posts or fronts, (or pent-houses,) placed at the entrance of each chamber.’ ‘These were broad within, to disperse the light, and narrow without.’ (Louth.) The arches seem to have been built above each door, with a window in them; as it is generally practised in many cities at present. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. “The outward court” was within the porch above described; but without, or more distant from the temple than the inner court. It is supposed to have been surrounded by cloisters, or porticoes, with a pavement under them; and over these were chambers, for the use of the priests and Levites; or rather for storehouses, in which to preserve the sacred oblations.

V. 18. Perhaps there was a pavement between the porticoes on each side, facing the entrance called the lower pavement, because the pavement on each side, under the porticoes, was raised higher than this was.

V. 19. The distance between the inner door, into the outward court, and the door at the other extremity into the inner court, was a hundred cubits. The way to the temple was a continued ascent; so that the door into the inner court was the higher, that into the outward, the lower, gate. The width of this part of the court from south to north was the same as the length from east to west. At least this seems the most obvious construction of the concluding words.

V. 20. The north-gate, into the outward court, which is next described, was made nearly, if not exactly, in the same manner as the east gate, &c.

V. 21, 22. (Notes, 13, 15, 16.)

Before them. Or, 'suitable to them; that is, to those 'of the east-gate.' (Louth.)

V. 23. (Note, 19.) 'The north-gate of the inner court
'did exactly answer this north-gate of the outer court: and
'in like manner the east-gate of the inner court answered
'the east-gate of the outward court.' (Louth.) 'The 'gate of the inner court was over against the gate, (that is, of the outward court,) 'as well on the north side as on 'the east.

V. 24-27. (Marg. Ref.) It seems there were no gates on the west; though the courts may be supposed to have extended, by the sides of the temple, to the western wall: at least the square, at first described, within the surrounding wall, would admit of this, (5.)

V. 28. The outward court enclosed the inner, on the east, north, and south sides. Thus the prophet was led from the south-gate of the outward court, to the south-gate of the inner, which was over against it; and so into the inner court itself.

V. 29-31. (Notes, 8-15.) The entrance into the inner court seems to have been through a portico, like that at each gate of the outward court, with little rooms for porters, and spaces between, of the same dimensions, and with a pent-house towards the outward court: but the ascent was by eight steps; whereas the outward court had but seven. 'The fifteen Psalms from the hundred and twentieth, called Songs of degrees, or ascents, are supposed to have been sung on some of these steps.' The arches, (30,) are supposed to have been built, over the spaces which separated the porter's lodges; and to have been twenty-five feet in height.

34 And the arches thereof were toward the outward court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had ^b eight steps.

35 ¶ And he brought me ¹ to the north gate, and measured it according to these measures.

36 The ^a little chambers thereof, the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, and the windows to it round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits.

37 And ¹ the posts thereof were toward the outer court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps.

38 And ^a the chambers, and the entries thereof, were by the posts of the gates, ^a where they washed the burnt-offering.

39 And in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two ^a tables on that side, to slay thereon ^b the burnt-offering, and ^a the sin-offering, and ^a the trespass-offering.

40 And at the side without, ^{*} as one goeth up to the entry of the north gate, were two tables; and on the other side, which was at the porch of the gate, were two tables.

41 Four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side, by the side of the gate; eight tables, whereupon they slew their sacrifices.

42 And the four tables were of hewn stone for the burnt-offering, of a cubit and an half long, and a cubit and an half broad, and one cubit high: whereupon also they laid the instruments wherewith they slew the burnt-offering and the sacrifice.

43 And within were [†] hooks, an hand broad, fastened round about: and ¹ upon the tables was the flesh of the offering.

44 ¶ And without ¹ the inner gate were the ^a chambers of the singers in the inner court, which was at the side of the north gate; and their prospect was toward the south; one at the side of the east gate, having the prospect toward the north.

45 And he said unto me, This chamber, whose prospect is toward the south, is for the priests, ^x the keepers of the [†] charge of the house.

46 And the chamber whose prospect is toward the north is for the priests, ^y the keepers of the charge of the altar: ^z these are the sons of Zadok, among the sons of Levi, ^a which come near to the Lord to minister unto him.

47 So he measured the court, ^b an hundred cubits long, and an hundred cubits broad, four square; and the altar that was before the house.

48 And he brought me to the ^c porch of the house, and measured each post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side: and the breadth of the gate was three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side.

CHAP. XLI.

The posts, doors, walls, chambers, founda- tions, dimensions, divisions, and orna- ments, of the temple, 1—26.

V. 42, 49. The length of the porch was the same as the breadth of the temple; that is, twenty cubits. Two doors of three cubits wide, opening each way, seem to have formed the entrance; these with five cubits on each side, called "the post of the porch," amount to sixteen cubits; and the other four cubits may be supposed to have been the distance from these posts to the outside of the walls of the temple. The breadth of the porch, in Solomon's temple, was only ten cubits, or half the length; but here it is represented as eleven cubits. The ascent from the inner court into the temple was by steps; and there were two pillars as in Solomon's temple. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the depth of the tribulations of the Church and of believers, the Lord commonly gives some distant glimpses of approaching deliverance and comfort, to support their faith and patient expectation. The great builder of our spiritual temple, whose power and glory are infinite and eternal, always works by rule: and whilst he performs his secret counsels, he requires us to compare all our works with the standard of his word. This we should study carefully, that we may be fellow-workers together with him; and that our worship and obedience may be regulated by faith, and not by fancy or carnal wisdom. We should, therefore, "behold with our eyes, and hear with our ears," and set our heart upon all that the Lord showeth us; attending to the whole revelation of his will, and seeking the teaching of his Spirit; that we may be thoroughly furnished for every good work; and, if employed as ministers, may be able to declare the whole counsel of God to the people. Every part of scripture is divine, useful, and important, in different ways, or to divers persons; but it may not all be so immediately useful to us: others have had, and others will have, the benefit of some portions, which are to us not so intelligible or full of instruction. But if we cannot understand, or edify by any part of scripture, we should humbly acknowledge our own ignorance, and adore the divine wisdom and knowledge; and not allow ourselves to start objections on that account. Yet as some portions are more clear, and, to us at least, more important, than others: so a fondness for the study of the obscure parts in preference to the obvious, and for the tything of mint and cummin, above the weightier matters of the law, is a folly and a temptation sometimes even of godly men. The Church of God and all Christians are separated from the world, and protected by God; they are built on an immoveable foundation, and exalted in excellency and privilege above the nations of the earth; and they are continually and gradually ascending towards the Sanctuary above. A small chamber in this true temple is preferable to the most magnificent palace of the wicked: how glorious then must be the many mansions prepared in heaven for the disciples of Christ! There are even now great numbers of the churches of the saints; yet we may hope and pray, for their immense increase in numbers, and in grace and peace. They are all supported and sheltered by omnipotence: they have their measure of light, through ordinances and instruments, from Christ the Light of the world, by which they may walk and work comfortably: but it is not sufficient to gratify the thirst of knowledge of those who cannot be content to see through a glass darkly. Into these churches men have access as living members by faith in Christ; there they flourish as the palm-tree, by communion with God and his people; and they shall at length be made more than conquerors. The nearer we approach to God in profession or office, the more spiritual we should be. This will be best effected by daily looking to, and feeding on, our great Sacrifice, 'by faith in our hearts with thanksgiving;' nor should we be slack to commemorate His death, who hath "washed us from our sins in his blood, and made us kings and priests to God;" that we may here in the courts of his temple ripen for our removal to the sanctuary above, there to rejoice in his love, and glorify his name for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. 'By the posts are meant the door-cases on each side of the entrance, (xl. 48.) These were six cubits thick, on the north and south sides: the same thickness had the upper lintel over the door. The word rendered tabernacle, sometimes signifies covering. In this signification it may not be unfitly applied to the upper lintel, which is a kind of covering to the door.' (Lowth.) Some understand the verse of penthouses, in the front of the porch, on each side, six cubits wide, with a covering of the same dimensions.

V. 2. The door out of the porch into the sanctuary seems to have been wider than that out of the court into the porch. (Note, xl. 48, 49;) but the whole length of the porch is still made out to be twenty cubits, perhaps including the side-walls. The dimensions of the first sanctuary, and of the most holy place, accord with those in Solomon's temple. (4. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The partition wall, between the sanctuary and the holy of holies, is supposed to have been two cubits in thickness; the breadth of the wall on each side the gate seven cubits; and the entrance six cubits in width.

V. 5, 6. Six cubits. 'The thickness of the wall from the foundation; the first story of the side-chambers.' (Louth.) The lower side-chambers in Solomon's temple were five cubits wide. (Note, 1 Kings vi. 5, 6.) 'At five cubits height from the ground, the wall which supported these outward chambers abated of its thickness one cubit; and there was a rest or ledge of one cubit's breadth, on which the ends of each story were fastened:—but they were not fastened in the main wall of the house.' (Louth.)

V. 7. 'So much of breadth was added to the side-chambers, as was taken out of the thickness of the wall; so that the middle story was one cubit, and the upper story two cubits, larger than the lower rooms. And winding stairs, which enlarged as the rooms did, went up between each two chambers, from the bottom to the top: and there were two doors at the top of each pair of stairs, one opening into one room, and the other into that over against it. By the house is meant these chambers three stories high.' (9.) (Louth.)

V. 8. This may mean, that the prophet from the upper chamber had a view of the height of these buildings, which surrounded the temple: and considering the rests as a part of the foundation on which they were supported, it was a full reed, or six large cubits. (xl. 3.)

V. 9. This seems to be meant of the outward wall, which enclosed the side-chambers. The dimensions are large: but the whole structure was erected to be very strong and durable. The space of five cubits is thought by some to have been allowed as a walk before the chambers. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. A different word is here used for chambers than before: and some suppose that another row of buildings, at twenty cubits distance from the side-chambers, is intended. There was a row of chambers joined to the temple; and another row of buildings, parallel with them, with a passage of ten or eleven yards in breadth between them, besides the place that was left, before spoken of, (9.) But the description, and the various explanations of different commentators, are very obscure: and probable conjecture seems all that can be attained to on the subject.

V. 11. 'The doors of the lower rooms opened into the void space between the chambers.' (Louth.) This was the case both of those chambers which were on the south-side, and those on the north-side, of the temple. Perhaps all the doors faced this void place; an area from the stairs leading to it on each side.

V. 12. It has been supposed that there was a row of buildings on the south and north sides of the temple, (besides the side-chambers,) with a space of twenty cubits between: and perhaps some building was erected on the west end of the temple, seventy cubits wide and ninety long, with a wall five cubits thick. Some, however, understand the verse of a wall, which was continued from east to west, on the outside of all the buildings before-mentioned, by the sides of the temple, to the extent of ninety cubits, and at the west end, to seventy cubits.—From north to south is called its breadth, as it corresponded with the width of the temple; from east to west its length, as it was parallel with the length of the temple.

V. 13—15. These verses seem to mean, that the temple, with the buildings and spaces above described, occupied an area of a hundred cubits square.

V. 16. (Marg. Ref.)

From, &c. 'He measured from the ground up to the windows of the temple, which were placed above the side-chambers. The windows were covered, either because the side-chambers hindered their being seen in the inner court; or else they were covered on the inside with curtains drawn before them.' (Length.)

V. 17. 'The windows were placed above the height of the door, at the east end of the temple; and were continued at measured distances, at the same height along the wall, on both sides to the wall of the inner sanctuary; in which there were no windows.' (Length.) The windows on the out-buildings seem likewise to be included, which were placed at regular distances, and made in exact proportion.

V. 18—20. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Cherubim had four faces; but only two of these appeared in the carved work; the other two faces, that of an ox or eagle being supposed to be hid in the plain or surface of the wall.' (Length.) The two faces, which were most conspicuous, seem to be intended.

Up to above, &c. That is, to the windows.

V. 21. 'The listels, both of the temple and the inner sanctuary, were not arched, but square; with a flat beam—laid on the top of the side-posts.' (Length.)

V. 22. 'The altar of wood,' must signify that on which incense was burned. The dimensions are here much larger than those mentioned in Exodus; but that made by Solomon is supposed to have been larger than that made by Moses. Both of these, however, were covered with gold; and it is very remarkable, that in this temple described by Ezekiel, there is not the least mention made of gold or silver; though there was such a profusion of these metals, both in the tabernacle made by Moses, and in Solomon's temple. (Marg. Ref.) Does not this imply, that a glory of a more spiritual nature was intended under these emblems? Thus the glory of the second temple was greater than that of the first, because honoured by the personal presence of Immanuel.

This, &c. Some suppose, that the altar of incense is here called a table, because of the incense laid upon it, and presented to God: and others that the table of shew-bread was pointed out to the prophet, when his instructor said, 'This is the table,' &c. May not an intimation be here given, that under the New Testament, a table would be substituted for the altars of the Old Testament, in that ordinance, by which we are admitted to the nearest communion with our God and Father?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we carefully improve our instructions concerning the introductory parts of religion, we shall be led forward by our great Teacher into the interior parts of divine truth; that we may go forward in knowledge, wisdom, and experience, till we arrive in the most holy place above. The spiritual building, which the Lord is erecting, will prove both eminent and durable: our standing in the grace of God will be firmer, and our views and hearts more enlarged, in proportion as we mount upward in our affections and conversation: and all the windings and intricacies of a Christian's path still lead him upward. The peace and enlargement of the Church, and the believer's comfort and growth in grace, commonly make progress together. The cause of God gains ground gradually amidst all revolutions, under every dispensation: the boundaries of the Church were visibly extended by the first preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles: but they will be much more enlarged, when the Jews shall be converted, and all nations shall do service to the great Redeemer.—We have fellowship with angels in our employment and felicity, in proportion as we grow devoted to the service of our God and Saviour. Prudence, affection, and fortitude should unite with fervency, in all our services. The ordinances of God have hitherto been rendered more simple and spiritual: the table of the Lord has succeeded to altars and sacrifices; and the worship of God in spirit and truth, and the beauty of holiness, to the burdensome rites, and costly ornaments of the old dispensation. We should therefore endeavour to grow more simple in our dependence, and in our intentions and pursuits, and more spiritual in our affections and worship; for these times evidently mark the progress of the Church and every believer, towards the perfection of the heavenly world.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1. This is, by many commentators, supposed to describe some buildings, not before mentioned. Chamber, in the singular, is thought to be used for chambers, or rows of chambers in three stories. These seem to have been situated in the inner court, (13. 14;) perhaps just before the separate place, at the entrance from the north. (Mars. Ref.)

V. 2. Perhaps this means, that the north door was a hundred cubits from the entrance into the court; and the door, or gateway, or portico, was fifty cubits in length. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. 'One side of these buildings looked upon the void space about the temple, (xli. 10;) and the other toward the pavement belonging to the outward court,' (xl. 7.) (Lowth) There are difficulties in these delineations, which none seem hitherto to have cleared up. A reverence is due to the word of God; some instructive meaning is doubtless conveyed, which will one day be manifested: in the mean while, I would give any hints or conjectures that I can. I am, however, far from confident, that I have, in several particulars, shown the real meaning of the vision. But a hint or a conjecture, may give some other person a clue, which may help to lead him through these intricacies.

V. 4. There seems to have been two rows of these chambers, and a walk between of ten cubits width; with an entrance into it from the chambers, of one cubit in width.

7 And the wall that was without over against the chambers, toward the outer court on the forepart of the chambers, the length thereof was fifty cubits.

8 For the length of the chambers that were in the outer court was fifty cubits: and, lo, before the temple were an hundred cubits.

9 And * from under these chambers was † the entry on the east side, ‡ as one goeth into them from the outer court.

10 The chambers were in the thickness of the wall of the court toward the east, † over against the separate place, and over against the building.

12 And according to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south, † was a door in the head of the way, even the way directly before the wall toward the east, as one entereth into them.

13 Then said he unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers which are before the separate place, † they be holy chambers, where the priests that † approach unto the LORD shall eat the most holy things: there shall they lay † the most holy things, and the meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering; for the place is holy.

14 When the priests enter therein, then shall † they not go out of the holy place into the outer court, but there they shall lay their garments where they minister; for they are holy; † and shall put on other garments, and shall approach to † those things which are for the people.

These were not supported by pillars, built on the outside of the walls, as was the case in some other balconies or galleries; but merely by the wall itself: and therefore of course the chambers grew narrower in the second story than in the first, and in the third than in the second. It does not, however, appear, how the second story was supported, as the wall of the first story was made the basis of the balcony above it; and the wall of the second the basis of the third story. Perhaps some arch was formed for this purpose; and a slight one would suffice, as the weight to be supported towards the top of the building would be comparatively small.

present low and divided state of vital godliness. Whilst as spiritual priests we approach to the Lord, through our glorified High Priest, feed on the sacrifice that he hath offered, and appear before God clothed in his robe of spotless righteousness. We should be careful to exemplify the tendency of our principles in the holiness of our lives. We should in every thing support the distinction between sacred and profane: the minister must not leave the sanctuary to pollute himself by sin, to involve himself in secular concerns, or to renounce his ministry. The man that hath put his hand to the plough, and looketh back, is not fit for the kingdom of God: true believers continue to the end in the ways and service of the Lord; this is their privilege, their desire, and their practice. Sacred things must not be made subservient to secular interests; but these must be subordinated to the concerns of religion, and kept distinct from, or rendered subservient to, them. However the privileges and liberty of believers may be enlarged, or the boundaries of the church extended, a separation still subsists betwixt the righteous and the wicked, which will be manifested, and made final and eternal, in the approaching day of righteous retribution.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 2—5. (Marg. Ref.) 'The word, Behold, is an expression of joy and admiration: as if the prophet had said, Behold a wonderful and joyful sight! The glory of the God of Israel, which had so long departed from this place, is now returned to it, and the same way by which it departed,' (Louth).—It is not recorded, that the Glory of God visibly took possession of the second temple; as it had done of the tabernacle, and afterwards of Solomon's temple, when consecrated. It therefore seems necessary to look beyond the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the rebuilding of the temple, for the fulfilment of these predictions. Indeed the personal presence of Immanuel, at the second temple, rendered it more glorious than that built by Solomon; (Hag. ii. 9;) yet this part of the vision rather relates to the times, which are supposed to be predicted in the whole of this description; namely, those that shall succeed the stated to be built on a square at least of very near an English mile on each side, or four miles in circuit. This is far greater than either Solomon's temple, or that after the captivity ever was: or indeed than the mountain of the temple was capable of containing, according to the description of the Jewish writers. This shows that the vision cannot be explained of any temple that hath hitherto been built, nor indeed of any literal temple; but figuratively and mystically. Some learned men indeed, on the authority of the Septuagint, would substitute cubits for reefs in all these verses: but the word cubits does not once occur; whereas the word reefs is repeated four times. It is evident, that the Greek translators had Solomon's temple in view, and changed reefs for cubits, in order to adjust the dimensions of this temple to those of Solomon's: and that later writers have proposed the alteration in the text for the same reason. But, if men allow themselves to substitute one word for another, in the sacred text, because the alteration would render that consistent with their systems, which otherwise would be incompatible with them, there is no knowing to what lengths they may proceed. Surely it is better to acknowledge our ignorance, on such abstruse subjects, than to support a favourite scheme of interpretation by giving countenance to so dangerous a measure!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The public worship of God in his courts, the secret devotion of the closet, and the social intercourse of Christians, should all be attended to in their places; in order to produce a conversation becoming the Gospel of Christ.—When true religion shall diffuse its benign influence through the nations, and the churches of the saints shall be exceedingly multiplied, we may expect greater unity in judgment, worship, and practice, than there is in the conversion) of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land. The prophet saw the glory of the God of Israel coming "from the east." Christ is "the Sun of righteousness;" and as the sun ariseth in the east; so did he arise in the eastern regions, and thence his light hath been communicated to the western world. It is not intimated, that a dark cloud attended this visible glory, as under former dispensations: for the full light of the Gospel dispels the darkness which before rested on heavenly things. It was however attended by a voice like the noise of many waters: which may denote the efficacy of the Gospel in alarming and converting sinners, or the terrible denunciations of the Lord's vengeance on all opposers of his people, whom he will overwhelm as by the roaring and vehemence of some great inundation. "The earth also shined with his glory:" for the light of the divine truth, displaying the glory of God in Jesus Christ, shall illuminate all the nations when those times shall arrive. The glory of God, which the prophet saw, resembled that which had before appeared to him: (Notes, i. iii. x. xi.) He then foretold the destruction of Jerusalem with such exactness, that it might be said he came to destroy it: but now he predicted the Lord's return to the city, and its prosperity; and he had a renewal of the same vision, which caused him to prostrate himself in humble adoration of the divine majesty. Thus the glory of God filled the temple: and the divine Spirit brought the prophet into the inner court to witness that transaction.

V. 6. While the prophet was adoring the manifested glory of God, he was addressed by a voice out of the temple, and charged with the subsequent message. It is observed that the man who had been his instructor stood by him. If this was the Messiah, as many think, then the prophet had a vision of the three persons in the sacred Trinity manifesting in different ways their presence with him. (Notes, Matt. iii. 16, 17. xvii. 1-8.)

V. 7-9. JEHOVAH had dwelt between the cherubim, above the mercy seat and the ark of the covenant; so that in this respect he had a throne and a footstool at his temple: but the people and their kings had defiled his sanctuary and his holy name by their idolatries. "The carcasses of their kings," may signify, either the idols worshipped by the kings of Judah, which were as lifeless and as loathsome before God as putrid carcasses; or the dead bodies of the children whom they sacrificed to their abominable idols, upon high places erected within sight of the temple. But, indeed, they had brought their images even into the sanctuary itself: so that the thresholds and pillars of the places erected for idolatry stood close by, or over against, the threshold, pillars, and posts of the temple: and there was but a wall between the glorious God and these his contemptible and detestable rivals! Thus they provoked him, so that he consumed them in his anger. But the Lord here engaged, that this shall no more be the case: the house of Israel shall no more defile his sanctuary and his holy name, as they had done: "Now shall they," says he, "put away their whoredom and the carcasses of their kings far from me, and I will dwell in the midst of them for ever." This is the literal translation of the ninth verse. It is evidently a prediction, or a promise, and not an exhortation. And thus it exactly accords with the prophecies in many of the chapters preceding this vision. (Marg. Ref.) After the return of the Jews from Babylon, they relapsed no more into gross idolatry: but they soon were led to prefer their own traditions and superstitions to the commandments of God; and they rejected Christ, to cleave to their own pharisaical righteousness. Thus "they set their thresholds by God's threshold." The same hath been more or less done by every society of Christians and their rulers: but the Lord will shortly purify his whole church from all abuses, idolatries, superstitions, false doctrines, and human inventions: and when this is done, he will come gloriously to dwell in his Church for ever; on earth to the end of the world, in heaven to all eternity.

V. 10, 11. "Show the house of Israel, &c. and they shall be ashamed," &c. The Jews must be shown the measure and pattern of the house, in order to render them ashamed of their idolatries and iniquities; and when fully this had produced its effect, they would be more fully 12 This is the law of the house; ^d Upon the top of the mountain, the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house.

13 ¶ And these are the measures of the altar after the cubits: ' The cubit is a cubit and an hand breadth; even the * bottom shall be a cubit, and the breadth a cubit, and the border thereof by the † edge thereof round about shall be a span; and this shall be the higher place of the altar.

14 And from the bottom upon the ground even to the lower settle shall be two cubits, and the breadth one cubit; and from the lesser settle even to the greater settle shall be four cubits, and the breadth one cubit.

15 So † the altar shall be four cubits; and from † the altar and upwards shall be 4 four horns.

16 And the altar shall be ^b twelve cubits long, twelve broad, ⁱ square in the four squares thereof.

17 And the settle shall be fourteen cubits long and fourteen broad in the four squares thereof; ^k and the border about it shall be half a cubit: and the bottom thereof shall be a cubit about: ^l and his stairs shall ^m look toward the east.

18 ¶ And he said unto me, Son of man, thus saith the Lord God, ' These are the ordinances of the altar, in the day informed concerning all the regulations and laws of it, which would be written before them, that they might do them. This would tend to remind them of what God had done for them in times past, and to show them what he had reserved for them in future: and on both accounts to make them ashamed of their rebellions: it would also serve to expose their sins, and to direct their reformation. This may also refer to the times, when the whole church shall be reformed according to the standard of scripture: when all Christians shall discern by that light their deviations from the truth of God, in doctrine, discipline, worship, and practice, and; repenting of them, attempt to rectify them. ' We may probably suppose, that the model of ' God's temple, here set forth, is but a pattern of heavenly things, as Moses' was, (Ex. xxv. 40;) and a ' type of that pure church, "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief " Corner-stone," which we may hope God will, in due ' time, every where restore. And in the mean time it is ' the duty of all good Christians, according to their ability, ' to inform themselves and others, what is the pattern, ' form, and fashion of this true church,—in order to reform all those deviations which have been made from it.' (Lowth.)

V. 12. This is the law, or rule, concerning the house; that the whole area above described, (xlii. 16—20,) should be most holy, and no part of it used for common purposes.

V. 13—17. The bottom of the altar, which lay on the ground, seems to have extended a full cubit beyond the rest of it; and a border of a span breadth was placed around it, as some think, to keep the blood of the sacrifices from running upon the pavement, and to confine it to the channel by which it was carried off. This was the higher place, or ground, compared with the rest of the court, being raised one cubit above it. From this bottom to the lower settle was two cubits. The settles seem to have been ledges of a cubit in breadth, on each side of the altar, on which the priests might walk to perform what was needful to be done. From the lower settle to the higher was four cubits. The lower settle, or in-benching, is called the lesser, and the higher, the greater: yet it does not appear, that the higher was broader than the lower: and the extent of it must have been less: but it would be most conspicuous on account of its height, and so more noticed. Above this upper-settle the altar was raised four cubits, and on the corners four horns were fixed. The upper part of the altar was twelve cubits square; but the lower settle, measuring at the outside, was fourteen; for the two settles deducted two cubits on each side from the dimensions at the bottom. God commanded in the law, that the priests should not ascend by stairs, or steps, to the altar: and the original here only means ascents, probably by a sloping gradual rising. ' This ascent is directed to ' be placed at the east side of the altar, that they who ' went up should look toward the west and upon the ' temple; and should turn their backs to the rising sun, ' in opposition to the rites of those idolaters who worshipped the rising sun. Dr. Lightfoot remarks, out of ' the Jewish writers, that within two cubits of the top, ' or place where the hearth was, there was another narrowing of a cubit in breadth, where the priests stood to officiate. The altar is mentioned under different names: ' Harel is the mountain of God, as some Rabbinis think, ' in opposition to the idolatrous altars built upon high places: Ariel is the lion of God, because it devoured ' and consumed the sacrifices.' (Lowth.) Perhaps the hearth is particularly meant. The description of this altar materially differs from the account given of that which was made when Solomon built the temple. That was indeed nearly the same height as this, but it was twenty cubits square; and nothing is said about any settles or in-benchings; but the reader is led to suppose that it was as wide at the top as at the bottom: and the altar erected after the captivity was set upon his bases, probably on the very foundation of the altar made by Solomon, and of the same dimensions. These considerations confirm the supposition, that the state of the church, or of Israel, when converted to Christ and restored to their own land, is predicted, under emblems taken from the ceremonies of the Mosaical dispensation. But, perhaps, the precise meaning of each particular will not be understood, till explained by the fulfilment.

V. 18--27. These rules for the dedication of the altar, and consecration of the priests, in some things agreed with, in others differed from, those prescribed by Moses. But the instruction seems to be the same as hath been deduced from those types and shadows of the ceremonial law, in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers: and the same evangelical truths are here prophetically proposed, as were there exhibited in the way of positive injunction. It is remarkable that the prophet is addressed as if he were personally to superintend the service in the same manner that Moses did, when the tabernacle was set up, and when Aaron and his sons were consecrated. Yet he was not employed at the consecration of the altar or temple, after the captivity: but probably was dead before that time.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1--12.

All external institutions of religion derive their excellency and efficacy from the presence and manifested glory of God in them: and as this glory is displayed by Christ our Sun of righteousness, we sinners may behold it with comfort. His voice indeed is very terrible to his enemies, and at first excites great commotion and consternation in the hearts of his chosen people: but when they are taught by the Holy Spirit, they experience its power accompanied with peace and comfort to their souls. Every display of the divine glory should inspire our hearts with reverential awe; and the condescension and multiplied visits of our gracious God, should never cause us to forget our own unworthiness and vileness. He may for a time hide his face from his Church or any of his servants, to rebuke their sins and to humble them for their good: but in due time he will return: and as his glory irradiates the soul of him that beholds it, so it will ere long illuminate the whole earth.—

It is of the infinite mercy of our God, that he reigns upon "the throne of grace" over his redeemed people, and makes his Church the place of the soles of his feet. But if we would have the assurance and comfort of this his condescending love, we must seek his sanctifying grace; that we may no more defile his holy name, or our souls that are his temple, by our sins; or his Church by immoralities, impieties, or superstitions. For by thus setting up their thresholds and posts in opposition to the Lord's, even kings have often substituted a carcass of worthless, if not idolatrous, observances, in the place of vital and evangelical godliness. And for these things, God hath abhorred the services of his professed people, and consumed them in his anger, from age to age. As every particular will be regulated and reformed in that happy period which approaches, according to the sacred scriptures; so we should now put away whatever hath displeased God in the conduct of his people in other ages, that we may personally anticipate those times, and do what we can towards preparing for them. The goodness of God towards us should lead us to repentance; and the discovery of the rule and pattern for our conduct will show us the necessity of it, and direct us in it; "for by the law is the knowledge of sin." But when Christ crucified, and "the things that are freely given us of God" through him, are shown to the soul by the Holy Spirit, they peculiarly fill us with shame for all our iniquities. This penitent frame of mind prepares us for fuller discoveries of the mysteries of redeeming love, and for a more distinct understanding of all the ordinances and commandments of God. The whole of the scriptures are written, and should be opened and applied, that men may perceive their sins and repent of them, and their duties and do them: that all, which belongs to the Church of God, may be most holy, according to the law of the house.

V. 13—27.

We wretched sinners can no more be holy, without the sanctification of the Spirit, than we can be righteous, or have access to God, except through Christ, our Altar, Priest, and Oblation. We now need offer no more atoning sacrifices, for "by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;" but the sprinkling of his blood is incessantly requisite to us, in all our approaches to God the Father. Even his royal and chosen priesthood, who minister unto him, could not be permitted to present their spiritual sacrifices, were they not cleansed from guilt through his precious blood: all their powers and faculties and senses need the same cleansing, before they can serve God acceptably in body and soul: their best services contract so much pollution from remaining sinfulness, that they can only be accepted, as sprinkled with that blood which cleanseth from all sin. But when they come in the appointed way to the mercy-seat, their Advocate pleads for them within the sanctuary above, and his blood is the propitiation for their sins: they themselves become living sacrifices, holy and acceptable to God through him; and being daily washed in his blood and seasoned with the salt of his purifying grace, they "glorify him in body and spirit, which are his." All our approaches to God should be with recollection and deliberation: our hearts should be previously prepared for attending on solemn ordinances, especially for devoting ourselves to the Lord at his table: ministers should seriously prepare for entering upon, and continually executing, their important work: and we should all daily be preparing to meet our God in death and judgment; that we may then find his gracious acceptance, and render him our eternal Hallelujahs.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIV. V. 1—3. He brought me to the gate of the outer sanctuary, which looked eastward; and that gate which I had seen formerly open, (as that by which the glory of God visibly entered into the temple,) was now shut. Then said the Lord unto me, this gate shall continue shut, and no ordinary person shall ever enter by it; because the Lord God of Israel hath honoured and hallowed it, by entering in thereby.' (Bp. Hall.) Some suppose, that by the prince the high priest is meant; and others the civil governor, as Zerubbabel, or Nehemiah. But as no such rules were laid down in the Mosaic law, or prescribed concerning Solomon's temple: so there appear no traces of their having been observed under the second temple. The Prince, in many of the preceding prophecies, evidently means Christ, (Marg. Ref. :) And whatever be prophetically intended, the injunction may remind us, that none can enter heaven, the true sanctuary, as Christ did; namely, by virtue of his own excellency, and his personal holiness, righteousness, and strength. He who is the Brightness of JEHOVAH's glory entered this way: but it is now shut to the whole human race; and we all must enter as sinners, by faith in his blood, and by the communication of his grace. The prince, having entered by the portico of this gate, would there sit to eat bread before the Lord: and then return to his palace by the same way, (xlii. 8, 9.) this may signify the Saviour's meeting his people, and communing with them in his ordinances, and especially at his table; and coming to them and returning to his heavenly palace, so to speak, by a way of his own; as the kings of the house of David did from their palace to the temple and back again. (Marg. Ref.) JEHOVAH, by an audible voice out of the sanctuary, is represented as thus speaking to the prophet.

V. 4. 'The east-gate being shut, there was no door into the house on the north side; but I could see the brightness of the divine glory shining through the windows.' (Lowth.)

V. 6 (Marg. Ref.) When the prophet had well compared the conduct of his people with the laws of the house, it would be evident to him that they had been guilty of many abominations; and he was ordered to call them to repentance and reformation, as they had already become exceedingly guilty.

V. 7-9. 'Setting up idols within the precincts of the house, and appointing idolatrous priests to officiate there.' 'Or they suffered the heathen to offer at God's altar expressly against the law.' (Louth.) The last mentioned profanation is not recorded in any instance.—The introduction of uncircumcised persons to eat of the peace-offerings and oblations, would have been a gross violation of the Mosaic law. But the uncircumcised in heart, as well as in flesh, are mentioned; yet there was no law to exclude unregenerate persons, who were circumcised and ritually clean, from the ordinances of the temple: so that this must denote a different constitution. And it seems to refer to the prostitution of the Christian sacraments, by admitting ungodly persons, who come from secular motives, to partake of them; and to the admission of such persons into the ministry, as seek nothing but the emolument; which things are the scandal, and threaten the ruin, of the protestant churches, as well as others. Thus God's covenant is broken, and its seals and the most sacred institutions of Christianity are prostituted, secularized, and abused; the most holy things are neglected, and keepers are placed over the charge of God in the sanctuary, to please the humours, to flatter the pride, or to subserv the lusts of men. All these abuses will be terminated, when this prophecy shall be fulfilled.

V. 10--14. Even those Levites, who were also priests as descended from Aaron, had often led the Jews into idolatry, by their example and influence; and yet in general they had been permitted to perform the most honourable parts of their sacred function: but, in the times predicted, such persons would deservedly be disgraced, and punished by degradation to the meaner and more laborious services; such as the work of porters, or slaying the sacrifices.—Few, if any, of those who before the captivity had been criminal in this respect, witnessed the restoration of the temple-service; nor does it appear that their descendants were thus degraded, on account of the idolatry of their ancestors: and after the captivity, it is not recorded, that any of the priests were guilty of leading the people to worship idols. But a thorough reformation of the whole Church, or the prevalence of pure religion among the converted Jews, is evidently predicted, under allusion to Mosaic institutions. Thus, perhaps, those ministers who have countenanced antichristian idolatries, or who have been heretical in their doctrines, or scandalous in their lives, may be excluded from the sacred service, and otherwise punished and disgraced, when the times here predicted shall arrive: yet, being brought to repentance, they may be employed in the worship of God, and admitted to perform more ordinary services. Or, in general, effectual means will be used, to prevent the exceedingly great scandal and mischief of an unregenerate and ungodly ministry.

V. 22. According to the law, the high priest was not allowed to marry either a widow, or a divorced person: but here, all the priests are forbidden to marry any widow, except the widow of a priest. (Notes, Lev. xxi. 7. 13-15.) This regulation plainly intimates the superior sanctity of the times referred to. There is no reason, however, to induce us to a literal interpretation of this regulation, as if binding on Christian ministers, any more than for such an interpretation of the other rules of this vision: it only implies, that in the predicted period they would avoid all scandalous or suspicious connexions, and every thing that could lessen their characters amongst the people.—It is observable, that marriage is always considered as consistent with the most sacred characters, and in the most holy persons, under every dispensation of the Church, and even in its highest state of earthly purity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23, 24. The priests and Levites under the Mosaic dispensation frequently acted as Magistrates. In allusion to which, it is perhaps here intimated, that controversies will, in the times predicted, be generally decided by arbitration; by reference to ministers and according to the law of God; and not by litigations before human tribunals, according to the laws of man, (5.)—The particular mention of hallowing the sabbath, in this emblematical prophecy of a future prosperous state of religion, implies the importance, as well as the perpetual obligation, of that sacred institution: when true piety most prevails, it will be most honoured by ministers and people.

All who are employed in the important work of the ministry, should be of harmless and blameless conversation; sound in the faith, full of good works; of exemplary temperance, sobriety, and gravity; walking humbly before God and circumspectly in the sight of men; not arrogating honour to themselves, or leading the people into a superstitious veneration of them; yet acting honourably, and maintaining a sober peculiarity in their whole conduct. They should perform the most common actions of life, in a pious and sanctified manner; their apparel, and the whole of their style of living, should be plain, simple, frugal, and such as may manifest their indifference about worldly things: they should be careful in forming connexions, and in the choice of wives, and prudent in the management of their families; showing that they are governed by reason, conscience, and the fear of God, not by passion and humour, in all these matters. They should teach the people, both by word and example, the difference between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean: they should study to be peace-makers, and should regulate their judgment and decisions in all cases by the commandments of God; and not according to their own humours, interests, or partialities: they should observe, and teach others to observe, the statutes of the Lord, in all the ordinances of his house and in hallowing his sabbaths: they should govern their passions and moderate their sorrows, by stricter rules than they expect others to do; not suffering their work to be interrupted, or improperly performed, whenever they can help it. They should delight in every part of their sacred services; and yet do all in a humble reliance on Christ our Sin-offering, and his precious blood and prevailing intercession: and they should be superior to all avarice and sensuality. The Lord himself is the Portion of such ministers: and they need not fear a temporal subsistence, though they have no possession in Israel. Their God will incline his servants to perform their bounden duty, by supplying their wants: and thus he will cause his blessing to rest on the houses of their benefactors, in answer to their prayers for them. So that they will not generally be obliged to involve themselves in worldly cares and employments for a maintenance: much less will they be driven to do any thing sinful or scandalous through urgent necessity: but trusting in God and doing his will, they shall be provided for as is good for them; and having food and raiment, they will learn to be therewith content. Lord, increase the number of such faithful and exemplary ministers; and enlarge and prosper the spiritual priesthood, all over the whole earth!

entirely differs from that which took place in the days of Joshua; and nothing at all answerable to it seems to have occurred when the Jews returned from Babylon: but whether it will be, in any measure, literally fulfilled at their future restoration to their own land; or whether it figuratively describes the regulations which shall at length take place in the affairs of the Church, needs not to be positively determined. It seems evident, that our translators did right in adding the word reeds to the numbers mentioned in this admeasurement; referring to the reed that was in the hand of Ezekiel's divine conductor, which was about four yards long: for the length and breadth of the sanctuary are stated the same as before. So that, unless the text be there totally changed, without any authority, this passage, as well as that, must be understood of reeds: and, except when the suburbs are mentioned, the word cubit does not once occur in either place. 'According to this measure (of cubits,) the portion here set out will be almost seven miles square; whereas, if we measure by reeds, it will arise to six times as much, and can only be understood in a mystical sense.' (Lowth.)—This surely is not a sufficient reason for altering the original text: for a great part of the vision, on any supposition, can only be thus interpreted. There are, however, those who make these measures immensely larger: but I neither understand their rules of computation, nor the grounds on which they proceed. It is indeed evident, that the land of Canaan could by no means admit of so large a proportion being allotted to the sanctuary, with the priests and Levites, &c.: but, it is probable this was intended to intimate the immensely large extent of the Christian church above that of Israel; especially in those glorious times which are doubtless emblematically predicted. Supposing, therefore, that reeds are intended, this holy oblation would constitute a square, on the lowest computation, of above forty miles on each side. On the north end of this square, a portion of above sixteen miles in width, and above forty in length, is appointed for the priests, for their houses and possessions: but in the midst of this portion, the area of the sanctuary, about a mile square, was to be enclosed by a wall. Next to this, on the south, the other Levites were to receive their portion, of the same dimensions with that of the priests and the sanctuary. And south of this, the portion for the city was to be marked out, of the same length, but only half the width, of the portions allotted to the priests and Levites. These three portions constitute the square of twenty-five thousand reeds: and that set apart for the Prince, (the breadth of which is not mentioned,) extended in length, equal to the breadth of the before-mentioned portions; from north to south, on both the east and the west sides of the square. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xlviii.) In the predicted period, the worship and ministers of God will be liberally and conveniently provided for: the princes will be both able and willing to defray the expenses of government without oppressing their subjects; and will rule over them with equity and clemency, as the vicerents of Christ; and the people will submit to them conscientiously, and live in peace, prosperity and godliness. These things seem to be represented in language taken from the customs of the times in which the prophet wrote. Tithes are not here mentioned.

(Lowth.)

V. 14, 15. The oblation of the sixtieth part of the wheat, barley, and oil, and one lamb out of two hundred, may be considered as the stock for the daily sacrifices, and the fund from which the ordinary expenses of the sanctuary were to be defrayed. V. 17. If Christ be meant by the prince, as some think, this signifies, that he alone is the atoning sacrifice for the sins of his people; and whatever oblations they present, or whatever services they acceptably perform, must be offered in his name. The feasts here specified were typical of Christ and his salvation, and represented the sacred seasons and instituted ordinances in the Church, by which they are commemorated, and the blessings of them applied to the soul; especially the preaching of the Gospel, the Lord's day, and the Lord's supper. The difference between these regulations and the ceremonial law, may intimate a change in the external constitution of the Church.

V. 18-25. 'The words are directed to the prince,—he was to provide the sacrifices; and the priest was to offer them.' (Louth.) The marginal references show in what respect these regulations agreed with, and in what they varied from, those of the Mosaic law.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should present to the Lord an oblation of the first and best of all our possessions, that we may honour him with our substance, and obtain his blessing on all our labours and comforts. It is the duty of Christians, according to their ability, to provide for the decent and comfortable subsistence of ministers, that they may attend to their work without distraction. But it becomes ministers to be content even with a scanty provision, and to "suffer" all things rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ." The interests of religion require that they should generally reside near their work, and as retired as may be from the vain hurry of the world: that they may give themselves to the word of God and prayer; and that every thing pertaining to them may savour of holiness and piety. Subjects also should willingly contribute what is requisite to the honourable support of their governors, and the charges of government: and princes, especially the princes of Israel, ought to imitate the equity and lenity of Christ our King: they should use their authority for the good of the people, and lay no needless or oppressive burdens on them; that they may comfortably enjoy their possessions. If any have deviated, (as, alas! too many do,) from these salutary rules; they must be warned to proceed no further, but to let the past iniquity suffice; to remove all violence and spoil, and to terminate all exactions. These are the duties of men in every age: and the happy time is coming, when all ranks in every part of the earth will attend to them. Then there will be no more fraud, oppression, misery, war, or devastation; but universal righteousness, peace, and prosperity. It is an important part of the will of God, that men should deal with exact honesty in all the transactions of life: no zeal, orthodoxy, or diligence in religion can compensate for, (though they may for a time cloak) the want of truth and justice in our moral conduct: the Lord requires a just weight, and a true balance, and exactitude in every one of our dealings. All should use their influence, and improve their talents, in promoting the cause of godliness. The sabbaths and ordinances of God and the commemoration of his benefits should be our chief delight and satisfaction: and we should aim to reduce our various duties to some regular method, that they may not interfere with each other; and to persist in it till it becomes habitual. And, though nothing we do can atone for sin, yet our zealous services testify our acceptance of the sacrifice of Christ, our Prince and High Priest, which, according to his part, he hath prepared for us, and to which we must have continual respect in all our approaches to God. For our very best duties are polluted with sin, and we pollute the ordinances in which we join, and all we are connected with, till they are cleansed in the fountain of his blood: and our errors, ignorance, and simplicity, as well as our wilful sins, need the same cleansing. But his oblation of himself once offered is of infinite sufficiency, and answers these and all other purposes of mercy to the whole multitude of believers, in every age and nation; and it would equally suffice for the whole human species, were they made willing to come to God by him, who by one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." As therefore Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; let us keep the feast of faith and communion with him, not with the old leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth: let us begin our years, our months, our weeks, and days, with self-examination, repentance, faith, prayer, and devotedness to God; and spend them in the same manner. Let us live like strangers and pilgrims on earth, rejoicing in Christ, as we pass through this desert to heaven: and then we shall soon arrive in those mansions above, "where is fulness of joy, and pleasures at God's right hand for evermore."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1—3. The prophet had before observed, that "the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary, which looketh toward the east,—was shut;" and had been informed, that it must not be opened, but for the prince. (Note. xlv. 1—3.) But "the gate of the inner court" on the east is here spoken of. This was to be shut on other days, but to be opened on the sabbaths and new moons, until the evening. According to this, it seems, that none were at any time to come into the sanctuary by the east-gate of the outward court, except the prince: and that the priests and Levites must go into the inner court by the north or south gates, except on the sabbaths and new moons: when, entering the outward court by the north or south gates, perhaps they might pass into the inner court by the east-gate: or they must open it, that the prince might enter, and that the people might worship before it, with the altar and sacrifices full in view. — The prince only shall enter by the way of that gate; and when he is to enter, shall stand at the post of that gate, until the priests have prepared his burnt-offering and peace-offering; and when they have made this safe way for him, he shall come in, having first bowed down, and worshipped at the threshold of the gate. Likewise the people shall worship at the door of this gate, but they shall not presume to enter by it." (Bp. Hall.) This seems to denote the constant, reverential, and exemplary attendance of kings on the pure evangelical ordinances of religion, in the approaching flourishing days of the Church. — Some interpret it of Christ's meeting his assembled people on their solemn festivals, especially on his own day, to apply to them the benefits of his atonement and prevailing mediation. The gate on the sabbaths and new moons was not to be shut till evening; which implied, that those days should be wholly employed in religious exercises: whereas on other days men might attend as they had leisure, and then return to their ordinary employments. (12.)

V. 4—7. (Marg. Ref.) "This was a new ordinance; —the number of the beasts, and the proportions of the

3 And when the prince shall enter, ^k he shall go in by the way of the porch of that gate, and he shall go forth by the way thereof

9 But when the people of the land shall come before the Lord in the solemn feasts, ^m he that entereth in by the way of the north-gate to worship, shall go out by the way of the south-gate; and he that entereth by the way of the south-gate, shall go forth by the way of the north-gate; he shall not return by the way of the gate whereby he came in, but shall go forth over against it.

10 And ⁿ the prince in the midst of them, when they go in, shall go in; and when they go forth, shall go forth.

11 And ^o in the feasts and in the solemnities, ^p the meat-offering shall be an ephah to a bullock, and an ephah to a ram, and to the lambs as he is able to give, and an hin of oil to an ephah.

12 Now when the prince shall prepare ^q a voluntary burnt-offering, or peace-offerings voluntarily unto the Lord, one shall then ^r open him the gate that looketh toward the east, and he shall prepare his burnt-offering and his peace-offerings, ^s as he did on the sabbath day: then he shall go forth; and after his going forth one shall shut the gate.

13 Thou shalt ^t daily prepare a burnt-offering unto the Lord of a lamb ^u of the first year without blemish: thou shalt prepare it ^v every morning

14 And thou shalt prepare a meat-offering for it every morning, ^w the sixth part of an ephah, and the third part of an hin of oil, to temper with the fine flour; a meat-offering continually, by a perpetual ordinance unto the Lord.

15 Thus shall they prepare the lamb, and the meat-offering, and the oil, every morning ^x for ^y a continual burnt-offering.

16 ¶ Thus saith the Lord God: ^z If the prince give a gift unto any of his sons, the inheritance thereof shall be his sons', ^{aa} it shall be their possession by inheritance.

17 But if he give a gift of his inheritance to one of his servants, then it shall be his ^{ab} to the year of liberty; after it shall return to the prince: but his inheritance shall be his sons' for them.

18 Moreover ^{ac} the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance by oppression, ^{ad} to ^{ae} thrust them out of their possession; but he shall give his sons' inheritance out of his own possession: that ^{af} my people be not scattered every man from his possession.

'meat and drink-offerings, are different from those prescribed by the law.' (Louth.)

'Able, &c.' "According to the gift of his hand;" that is, what he shall think sufficient.

V. 8, 9. None but the prince could enter the sanctuary from the east, and there was no entrance from the west; so that all the people must enter from the north, or from the south. But they who entered from the north were to go out by the south; and they that entered by the south, to go out by the north. This may signify, that every thing should be regulated, in respect of divine worship, in that way, which may most effectually prevent disorder and interruption: but is generally supposed to intimate that men should go forward, and make progress in religion, and go through with it; and not be superficial, hypocritical, or apostate. 'There being no thoroughfare out of the temple westward, if the people had entered by the east-gate, they must have returned back the same way they came in; which would have been turning their back upon God and his residence.' (Louth.) But as the prince was to return by the east-gate, this reason is scarcely conclusive.

V. 10. Though the prince was to enter and return by a way of his own; yet he might enter the sanctuary at the same time, and continue as long there as the people; and thus testify his fellowship with them in the worship of God.

V. 12. 'When the service is performed, he shall go back the same way (8); and the porter shall shut the gate after him; because it may not stand open on ordinary days.' (Louth.)

V. 13—15. (Marg. Ref.) It is observable, that nothing is here said about the evening-sacrifice; or the additional lamb, morning and evening on the sabbath-days. Many suppose the evening-sacrifice to be included: but as the morning is repeated in a remarkable manner, and the evening is not once mentioned, it seems rather to be an intimation of that change in the externals of religion, which the coming of Christ would introduce.

V. 16—18. This may signify that princes in those days would not waste their revenues, in enriching favourites and dependents: the prince might settle a perpetual inheritance on his son; but the grant made to any servant would expire at the year of jubilee. Some think that this signifies, that Christ our Prince gives his children, or true believers, their inheritance unalienably: but they whom he only endues with gifts and talents, and employs in some part of his service, whilst they remain unregenerate, will be deprived of all, when true Christians receive the full possession of their inheritance. And in this case the eighteenth verse may be considered as descriptive of the character and government of our Prince of Peace. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19—24. ‘The flesh of the sacrifices, which were to be eaten, was to be boiled, except the flesh of the passover. There was a place in the inner court for boiling the trespass and sin-offerings, (19, 20;) and boiling places,—for the peace-offerings, which perhaps were dressed by the Levites; whereas the former were boiled by the priests in the court belonging to them.’—‘The Hebrew word Keturoh, translated joined, is rendered in the margin, made with chimneys, which well agrees with the description.’ (Lowth.) ‘About the walls of these little courts, which were as kitchens, were little chambers for the cooks.’ The most holy things, of which none but the priests might eat, were to be prepared in the inner court: the peace-offerings, of which the people partook, were to be boiled in these little courts, at the corners of the outward court. The direction, ‘not to bear the most holy things out into the outer court, to sanctify the people,’ may intimate, that the peculiar privileges of believers must not be granted or left open to unconverted persons; and that they should not promiscuously be admitted to partake of the Lord’s supper; as this tends to induce in them an opinion, that they are holy persons, and need not conversion: and thus occasions much superstition and delusion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

We should worship and commune with God every day, in our closets and families, and in public, as we have time and opportunity. On six days of the week, indeed, we are called to serve him in our temporal employments; and we must not neglect those duties, even for the sake of spending all our time in the more immediate worship of the Lord. But on his own day we must occupy ourselves wholly in his sacred service: and, laying aside all other employments and avocations, as much as may be; and shaking off sloth and inactivity, we must learn to delight in the succession of one religious exercise to another, as the proper business of the whole day: and it may be right occasionally to appropriate a day from the other six, to be spent in a similar manner. It behooves those in authority to use their influence and example, in promoting a general regard to the worship of God, and their wealth in preparing every thing for it; they should frequent his holy ordinances with reverence and attention, and without betraying any symptoms of weariness: for however they may be distinguished in other matters from their subjects, they are in the sight of God entirely upon a level with them; and every distinction admissible respecting his worship, between them and others, must be confined merely to external circumstances. But whether rulers will or will not join with us, in attending on the lively ordinances, in which Christ is set forth as evidently crucified among us; he, our Prince of Peace, will surely manifest his presence amidst us: and especially when we spend his holy day with his assembled saints, and feed by humble faith on that sacrifice, which he hath prepared and offered for us. In expectation and assurance of his glorious and gracious presence, we should worship with reverence in his courts; abound in spiritual sacrifices; consecrate our talents and substance to him, according to our ability; and take care that every thing be done decently and in order. We should recollect, that Press forward is the Christian’s motto: we must still depart further and further from our sins, and sinful pursuits and connexions; and get further into the knowledge, practice, and experience of the Gospel; and we should dread a hypocritical profession and worship, which generally terminate in a man’s returning into his old course of sin and death. The Lord hath prescribed us many duties, as of indispensable obligation: but he hath also graciously left many things to our voluntary choice; especially as to the proportion of our time or substance, to be appropriated to his immediate worship and service: that they who greatly delight in his commandments, may abound in them to his glory, the edification of their brethren, and their own benefit; without entangling their own consciences, or prescribing rules that might be inexpedient to others; or inducing them to formal services for which they have no heart, and in which God could have no pleasure. But we must never omit our daily worship, or to apply the sacrifice of the Lamb of God to our souls, for pardon, peace, and salvation.

The prophet is shown waters springing from under the threshold of the temple, growing wider and deeper, and at length becoming an impassable river, which healed the desert and the dead sea; abounded with fish; and had on each bank fruit-trees filled with new fruit every month, the leaves of which served for medicine, 1—12. 4 Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through the waters; the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through; the waters were to the loins.

5 Afterward he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over: for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over.

spiritual progeny with an unalienable inheritance: nor will he let any man in any way serve him, without allotting him a suitable reward. But it will be dreadful to be put off with a revocable portion, and to be left utterly destitute, when the children shall receive their full liberty and eternal inheritance: let us then rest in nothing short of regenerating grace, and the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits, that we are children and heirs of God.— If all princes had in them the mind that was in Christ, their peaceable subjects would never have cause to complain of being thrust out of, or scattered from, their possessions, in order that favourites and dependents might be enriched with the spoil. They would rather straighten themselves to relieve the people; as “knowing the grace of Christ, who, though he were rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich.” The minister of the Gospel is as truly serving Christ and the people, when in his study he is searching the scriptures, meditating and preparing for his work, as when he is publicly preaching the word to the congregation. He should endeavour to get well acquainted with his instructions, and to speak from a matured judgment, and an experienced heart. and with fervency of spirit: he should be careful, both in dispensing the word, and in administering the sacraments, to guard the people against superstition and false confidence, and from mistaking the notion or form for the power of godliness: and every thing, in his outward accommodations, and manner of life, and his method of spending his time, should be so regulated, as may best tend to make him a “workman that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.”

import of the whole vision. Doubtless both Solomon's temple and the second temple were well supplied with water, conveyed thither in order to wash the sacrifices, and for similar purposes; and to preserve every thing clean and wholesome: but these waters flowed originally from the temple, not as a common sewer, but as a delightful fertilizing river. The prophet had before surveyed the doors of the house; but he now first discovered a very small stream of waters. (so the word signifies,) springing forth from under the threshold of the house eastward, at his right hand, and at the south-side of the altar. These waters no doubt were an emblem of the “Gospel preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven” to render it effectual; and conveying with it all spiritual blessings to the souls of believers, and to the nations of the earth.— The gradual rise of the waters, denotes the large effusion of the Spirit, which was very remarkable at the first publication of the Gospel, and in its wonderful increase from small beginnings; and will be so again, when God shall “pour out the Spirit of grace” upon the Jews, in order to their conversion. The supplies of grace are often represented, in the holy writers, under the metaphor of a river, and streams watering the dry and thirsty earth, both cleaning and making fruitful the ground where they pass. The metaphor is probably taken from the river that watered paradise. (Louth.) When the prophet had been shown the source of these waters, he was led by his conductor to observe their progress and increase: and as the east gate was shut, he was brought out from the temple northward. When his conductor, with the line in his hand, had measured the length of the thousand cubits from the source, he led the prophet across the waters, which only reached to his ankles; but continuing to try their depth every thousand cubits, he found them grow still deeper every time, till they could no longer be forded, but were become a river impassable except by swimming. This was an emblem of the progress of Christianity, from small beginnings to a vast increase; and the latter part of the representation may relate to the times when the Gospel shall fill the earth, and produce the most extensive and important good effects on the state of mankind in every nation. Thus the river signifies the same as the "stoue, cut out without hands, and "becoming a great mountain and filling the whole earth;" and the grain of mustard-seed becoming a large plant, like a tree in which the fowls of the air make their nests. (Marg. Ref.) The passage may also be accommodated to the progressive growth in knowledge and holiness of true Christians: and it is often applied to the holy Scriptures, in which are some things plain to the meanest capacity, and others incomprehensible to the most exalted created understanding; and only to be apprehended by faith, as a river that cannot be forded.

V. 7. Trees, &c. (Note, 12.)

V. 8-10. These waters ran eastward into the desert, and then into the sea; which is supposed to mean the dead sea, or the lake of Sodom, that lay east of Jerusalem. In this sea it is said no living creature is found; at least it is probable, that it does not abound with fish, as other seas do. But the prophet was informed by his conductor, that when the waters from the sanctuary should enter the sea, its waters also would become wholesome and fit for the production and habitation of fishes; and whithersoever they flowed they would communicate life abundantly; so that fishers would spread their nets from one side of this lake of Sodom to another, (for En-gedi lay on one side, and En-eglaim on the other, of the lake,) and take exceedingly great quantities of all those kinds of fish which had been used to catch in the Mediterranean sea. This represented the efficacy of the Gospel, when attended by a divine influence, to communicate spiritual life to the most atrocious sinners, like those of Sodom; to render the Gentile nations productive of numerous converts; checking the progress of iniquity, undermining the foundations of idolury, reforming cities and countries, and bringing men to know, worship, and serve the one living and true God, where his name had not before been known. So that the ministers of Christ would meet with abundant encouragement to labour, and to preach the Gospel, where before none ever thought of being so employed: till at length the most hopeless and benighted nations would be abundantly filled with the light and holiness of true religion.

V. 11. There would however still remain some marshes, creeks, or swamps, into which these healing waters could not find an entrance; and these must be left incurably sterile and worthless. This represents the case of those who reject or abuse the Gospel; or those countries which exclude it from among them. In short, it is the only healing medicine for the distempers of our fallen race; and they will be given up as reprobate to final ruin who are not healed by it.

V. 12. (Note, Rev. xxii. 2.) St. John hath almost transcribed this part of the vision, and applied it to the salvation of Christ, as perfected in the felicity of heaven. In his vision, the trees on each side of the river of the water of Life, seem to signify the several parts of the mediatorial work of Christ, and the sufficiency of his salvation to supply all the various wants of believers, and to complete their uninterrupted felicity. But many expositors interpret this verse of believers, who are "trees of "righteousness" planted on the banks of this river in great abundance. Yet the plenteous provisions of the Gospel, the precious promises of the sacred word, and the privileges of believers, as communicated to their souls by the quickening Spirit, may be aptly thus represented. These abound on each side of the river, wherever the Gospel is successfully preached: they afford nourishment and delight to the souls of men; they never fade or wither; they are various, according to the variety of circumstances and occasions, in the Christian's experience; as if a tree should yield a succession of different kinds of fruit, through the months of the year: and even the leaves serve as medicines to their souls; the warnings and reproofs of the word, and the salutary correctives of their Father's rod, though generally less valued, and always less pleasant than divine consolations, yet tend to cure the maladies of their souls, and to restore them to holiness and happiness. --If believers are intended by these trees, the emblem shows that they are rendered flourishing and fruitful by the word and Spirit of God; that they become exceedingly useful; that they persevere in their fruitfulness and usefulness through the various changes of life; that they exercise various Christian graces in succession; and that their profession; doctrine, example, conversation, and endeavours, powerfully tend to instruct, reform, and benefit mankind.

V. 13--23. The prophet here again returns to the division of the land, the account of which had been interrupted by intervening discoveries; (xlv. 4--6.) As no such division of Canaan took place after the captivity, this must be understood of future events. Several names are here added, or changed for others: yet the boundaries of the land are nearly the same as were marked out by Moses; except, that it does not appear whether any part, or what part, of the country, east of Jordan, is included within the eastern boundary. (Marg. Ref) The ten tribes, as well as Judah and Benjamin, were to be admitted to a full share in the inheritance; and this seems to imply, that the future restoration of Israel to the promised land is predicted; while the circumstance of the strangers that sojourned in the land, being admitted to a share in the inheritance, as if native Israelites, plainly intimates the calling of the Gentiles into the church, and their joint inheritance with the Jews in the privileges of the Gospel and in the heavenly felicity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more carefully we examine the things of God and religion, the more interesting will be our discoveries concerning them. All our invaluable privileges and advantages are conveyed to us through the Gospel; they flow from Christ, our Temple, Altar, and door of access to the Father; they all spring from the everlasting love and mercy of our God, through his atoning sacrifice, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. No obstructions of men or fallen angels can interrupt the communication of spiritual blessings from the fulness of Christ to the souls of his beloved people; and the course of the greatest rivers might far more easily be stopped, than the progress of his Gospel. It hath hitherto continued gradually to diffuse its influence; and it will still run wider and deeper in its energy and effects, till it shall fill, heal, and fructify the whole earth. We may rejoice in the assured hope of this happy event; and in the mean time we may be satisfied, that the water, which Christ gives his praying people, shall be in them "a well of water springing up into everlasting life." Whilst we wait for the completion of our felicity, and are conflicting with various trials and temptations; let us attend to the sacred Scriptures, beginning with the most obvious and practical truths, and proceeding gradually to those that are most difficult; remembering that many things will be found incomprehensible to us, which we must apprehend by faith and humbly adore, but not pretend to fathom, or to judge of by our limited powers or our proud reasonings. But we should chiefly mark the blessed effects which the word and Spirit of God are every where represented as producing on the souls of men; that we may inquire whether they have wrought such a change in our judgments, dispositions, and affections? Into whatever place or heart of man these healing waters flow, they communicate divine life and holiness; they counteract the various evil propensities of our fallen nature, and teach men to "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." So that where they abound, knowledge, purity, piety, and equity, and every thing good and useful, abound likewise. How desirable then is it to be instrumental in sending the word of God to those regions which before were given up to ignorance, impiety, and vice! And to see the preachers of the Gospel encouraged to cast their nets, and to attend to their laborious work with patient hope, and some evident success, where before sin and Satan reigned with undisturbed sway! The time is coming when they shall thus labour and prosper in those distant regions which are now enveloped in Pagan or Mahometan darkness, with as much encouragement as the apostles did at Jerusalem, when numbers were daily added to the Church of such as should be saved: and their converts shall be of the same kind as those were, "when great grace was upon them all." Yet is this blessed Gospel of salvation the savour of death to numbers in every age: and they who are not made holy by it, because they neglect, oppose, or abuse it, must die in their sins, and perish without remedy. As the Lord hath so amply provided in Christ Jesus all the rich variety of spiritual blessings, that can conduce to our comfort and holiness; and as those blessings lose no part of their beauty or excellency by the succession of ages: so Christians also should study to be useful and fruitful, the lights of the world and the healing of the people; that their whole conduct and all their endeavours may tend to render men wiser, holier, and happier, on every side of them. They should bring forth fruit suited to the seasons of adversity and prosperity, and to the various occasions and circumstances in which they are called to act: they should consider it their duty and their privilege to have their leaf unwithering and their fruit increasing, because they are watered from the sanctuary of God: and they should delight in proceeding with increasing zeal and usefulness to serve him to the end of their lives. Surely none should deem themselves branches of the living vine, who do not in some measure bring forth such fruits as he did, when he went about doing good to the souls and bodies of men! And if all that bear the name of Christians and profess the doctrine of Christ, were of this character, his religion would appear to be most excellent and beneficial in the eyes of all beholders. Such Christians need not doubt of their inheriting the good land which Canaan typified, and which the Lord hath sworn to give to the seed of Abraham: all the Gentiles who believe in Christ, and are united to him by the supply of his sanctifying Spirit, are the children of Abraham, and heirs according to promise, and will share the privileges of Israelites, without marring their inheritance: for there is room in the Church and in heaven for all who come for an interest in the blessings of that new covenant, of which Christ is the Surety and Mediator.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVIII. V. 1—7. This division of the land entirely differs from that which was made in the days of Joshua; and it is not probable that it should ever literally take place: but it seems to denote the equality of privilege which subsists amongst all the tribes of the redeemed, whatever their previous characters have been, and their intimate union and communion with each other. 'This division of the land among the twelve tribes may imply, that all true Christians shall be equally sharers in the 'privileges of the Gospel.' (Lowth.) A portion is laid out for each tribe, directly across the country from east to west. (ilarg. Ref.) from the east side unto the west side; and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it.

9 The oblation that ye shall offer unto the Lord shall be of five and twenty thousand in length, and of ten thousand in breadth.

10 And for them, even for the priests, shall be this holy oblation; toward the north five and twenty thousand in length, and toward the west ten thousand in breadth, and toward the east ten thousand in breadth, and toward the south five and twenty thousand in length: and the sanctuary of the Lord shall be in the midst thereof.

11 * It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok; which have kept my charge, which went not astray, when the children of Israel went astray, as the Levites went astray.

12 And this oblation of the land that is offered, shall be unto them a thing most holy, by the border of the Levites.

13 And over against the border of the priests, the Levites shall have five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: all the length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand.

14 And they shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the first-fruits of the land: for it is holy unto the Lord.

15 And the five thousand, that are left in the breadth over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane place for the city; for dwelling and for suburbs: and the city shall be in the midst thereof.

16 And these shall be the measures thereof; the north side four thousand and five hundred, and the south side four thousand and five hundred, and on the east side four thousand and five hundred, and the west side four thousand and five hundred.

17 And the suburbs of the city shall be toward the north two hundred and fifty, and toward the south two hundred and fifty, and toward the east two hundred and fifty, and toward the west two hundred and fifty.

18 And the residue in length over against the oblation of the holy portion shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward: and it shall be over against the oblation of the holy portion; and the increase thereof shall be for food unto them that serve the city.

19 And they that serve the city, shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel.

20 All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand, by five and twenty thousand: ye shall offer the holy oblation four-square, with the possession of the city.

21 And the residue shall be for the Prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation toward the east border, and westward over against the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, over against the portions for the prince: and it shall be the holy oblation; and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof.

22 Moreover from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which is the Prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince.

23 As for the rest of the tribes, from the east side unto the west side, Benjamin shall have a portion.

35 It was round about eighteen thousand measures, ^p and the name of the city from that day shall be, † The Lord is there.

V. 35. It is most obvious to interpret these measures, of the reed which the prophet's conductor held in his hand: for what was the use of it, but to measure with? Or what measure should we compute by, but that which the Spirit of God hath pointed out to us? By this measure the city would be near forty miles in circuit, or ten miles on each side of the square; which was vastly larger than Jerusalem ever was. Doubtless the large dimensions of the city and land were intended to intimate the great increase of religion, and the propagation of the Gospel in the times predicted. The land here divided is never called Canaan, nor the city measured, Jerusalem; probably because they were merely figurative of spiritual blessings to the Church: but JEHOVAH-shammah, or, the LORD is there, is the name given to this holy city; signifying that his powerful and gracious presence with his Church is the source of all her peace, security, felicity, and holiness; and that at length these blessings will be abundantly communicated, and his presence and glory signally displayed among his people. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When true converts enter the Church by faith in Jesus Christ, all their former sins are blotted out, every stigma is removed, all distinctions are swallowed up, and the vilest of them are admitted to a full participation of all the privileges of the children of God, and made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Yet on earth some of them must be placed more advantageously than others for their spiritual improvement; and in proportion to their degrees of grace and fruitfulness on earth, so will be their capacity for, and enjoyment of, the glory and felicity of heaven.—

Our inheritance, as the spiritual priests of the living God, cannot be forfeited or exchanged: nor should we desire to change the temporal portion, which our gracious Lord hath allotted us. Especially it behooves the ministers of Christ to be contented in their places, and with such things as they have: and as they must by no means waste or alienate the revenues appropriated to the maintenance of religion; so the Lord will call those to a strict account who plunder them, or make the concerns of religion to subservise their love of filthy lucre. In the visible Church on earth, there will still be some part profane; even believers must spend part of their time in those employments which do not immediately belong to religion; and though these must be performed from pious motives and in a conscientious manner, yet they should be kept distinct from spiritual concerns. All that belong to the Israel of God should serve the common cause, in their proper places, and according to their abilities: and they who occupy themselves in so good a work, should not be left destitute of such things as are needful for them. The way of access into the Church is open on every side, that sinners may enter by faith, from all quarters of the globe, and from all the tribes of the earth: and all that belong to the true Church below, shall find at last admission into the holy city above: for all things are so regulated and established by the power, truth, and love of God, that no believer shall ever be ashamed of his confidence. Through the whole extent of the Church, even when it shall fill the earth, the Lord will vouchsafe his gracious presence and blessing. May we be found citizens of this holy city, and act consistently with that character; and have the benefit and comfort of the Lord's presence with us, in life, death, and for evermore.

BOOK OF DANIEL.

THE writer of this book was contemporary with, but probably younger than, Ezekiel; yet he began to prophesy before him, and continued in his prophetic office much longer. He was of the royal family of Judah; and having been early in life carried captive to Babylon, he soon became renowned for wisdom, and was advanced to great authority under Nebuchadnezzar: and he seems to have continued in an exalted station, and in offices of great trust and power, through the whole subsequent period of the Chaldean monarchy, and afterwards under Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian: yet he was all along more eminent for wisdom and piety, than for rank and authority. Josephus, no doubt speaking the current opinion of his countrymen at that time, calls Daniel 'one of the greatest of the prophets; for he was wont not only to foretel future things, as other prophets also did, but he likewise determined the time when they should come to pass.' But since his time, 'the Jews, in order to invalidate the evidence that results from the prophet's writings in support of Christianity, have, on the authority of a few doctors, agreed to class him among the Hagiographi, which decision, however, does not, upon their own rules, affect his pretensions to be considered as an inspired writer.' (Gray.)—It may further be noted, that this determination, and the frivolous reasons assigned for it, are strong proofs, that this prophecy, of seventy weeks, has created them exceedingly great difficulties; because, it so fixes the time of the Messiah's coming, that unless Jesus of Nazareth be He, all expectations of his coming must be finally disappointed, if Daniel was a prophet in the highest sense of the word.—Our Lord, however, called him "Daniel the prophet," with a special recommendation of his predictions, even the most difficult of them, to the attention of his disciples. (Compare viii. 13. ix. 27. xi. 31. xii. 11. with Matt. xxiv. 15. Mark xiii. 14.) And there is such a coincidence between his prophecies and those of St. John, 'that the latter, in his Revelation, doth more distinctly unfold those events, which the former foretels in general terms.' (Mede.)—But in his work hath been produced such instances of his having been a prophet, as an infidel cannot deny, or, if he denies, cannot disprove.' (Bp. Newton.)—The first six chapters are chiefly historical, though indeed the second chapter contains the prophetic interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, concerning the kingdoms which were successively to illustrate the power of God, who removeth and setteth up kings as seemeth good to him.—The four historical chapters which succeed, relate the miraculous deliverance of Daniel's companions from the furnace; the remarkable punishment of Nebuchadnezzar's arrogance, the impiety and portended fate of Belshazzar; and the divine interposition for the protection of Daniel in the lions' den. All these are written with a spirit and animation highly interesting. We seem to be present at the scenes described; and the whole is enriched with the most exalted sentiments of piety, and with the finest attestations to the praise and glory of God' (Gray.) The last six chapters are entirely prophetic; and a great part of them has generally been considered as extremely obscure. 'But it is the nature of prophecies not to be thoroughly understood, till they are thoroughly fulfilled. Not that such prophecies are therefore like the pagan oracles, of an ambiguous, equivocal, and delusive nature. Obscure they may be: but there is a wide difference between obscurity and equivocation. The pagan oracles were purposely worded in such a manner, that if they failed in one sense, they might hold good in another, though directly the contrary: the Scripture prophecies have a determined meaning; and though sometimes they may comprehend more events than one, yet they are never applicable to contrary events. The pagan oracles were delivered for the immediate direction of those who consulted them: and therefore a mistake at first was of more fatal consequence: the Scripture prophecies were intended more for the instruction of future ages; and therefore it is sufficient if time shall illustrate the particulars. The pagan oracles are no sooner understood, than they are despised:—the reverse is true of the Scripture-prophecies; and the better you understand, the more you will admire them. The completion of the former, demonstrates their fraud and futility, the completion of the latter, their truth and divinity,' (Bp. Newton.)—Some parts, however, of these predictions, are so exceedingly plain, and have been so exactly and circumstantially fulfilled, that Porphyry, a bitter enemy of Christianity, took occasion from this circumstance, to maintain that they were written after the predicted events. This is the most important testimony: for it shows, that the completion of those parts which relate to historical facts, terminating in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, was absolutely undeniable: yet it is capable of clear proof, that these prophecies were extant in the Greek language many years before Antiochus was born; and in the hands of the Egyptians, who had no kindness either to the Jews or their religion.

But, in fact, the prophecies of Daniel have in all succeeding generations received as undeniable accomplishments, as those did which relate to more ancient events. They all take their beginning from about the prophet's days: they all give a concise prophetic history of the Church and of the world, nearly to the end of time: for even the prophecy of the seventy weeks, though the first coming of the Messiah is the most prominent subject; yet shows the state of the Jewish nation to this day, and intimates events which have not yet taken place. They all, either expressly or by consequence, predict four great monarchies; the fourth of which shall last "to the time of the end;" "the end of the indignation." They all foretell long continued calamities to the Jewish nation, and to the people of God: at length terminating in the restoration of Israel, and the final and universal triumph of true religion; the kingdom of Christ and of his saints, which must endure to the general resurrection. They are not insulated predictions: they all exhibit the same grand outlines of the plan of Providence, to the period of the Church's calamities, varied in such a manner, as to reflect reciprocal light on each other. And for above two thousand years, the grand outlines of history constitute the best interpreter of the grand outlines of these astonishing prophecies. These four kingdoms have succeeded each other: they have answered the description given of them with the most surprising exactness. The Messiah came at the appointed period, and was cut off; the abomination of desolation was set up in the holy place; Jerusalem was destroyed; the poor remnant of the Jews were scattered, and remain so to this day. The fourth kingdom which thus desolated them, and persecuted the infant Christian Church, after a time, appearing in another form, has exactly answered the predictions of its blasphemy, tyranny, idolatry, and long continued dominion, given in this ancient book: and nothing now remains, but the destruction of this kingdom, the conversion of the Jews, and the final triumphs of true religion, to render the whole history of all those ages a clear comment on Daniel's prophecies.—One great cause of the uncertainty, which numbers complain of, as to the real meaning of these predictions, arises from learned and ingenious men trying to accommodate the events of their own time, (important indeed to them, but small in the grand concerns of the world during revolving thousands of years;) to some detached particulars in the prophecy. But it should be remembered, that prophecy is a very small, though exact map; on which, not every county-town, or considerable place, is found, but merely those of pre-eminent consequence.—No city, so to speak, is marked in Britain but London. It should, however, be also understood, that any interpretation, which violates the geography or chronology of prophecy, must be "a private interpretation," and not the real meaning. Only the grand outlines are marked, and those in their due order and arrangement. It is also of great importance to note, that many of the prophets, perhaps all, in some measure, agree in the grand events predicted: the coming of a Saviour, to be the Light of the world, a great High Priest and a glorious King: "His sufferings, and the glory which would follow:" the present state of the Jews, the corruption and persecutions of the Church by a powerful and blasphemous enemy, the final restoration of Israel; and the victories, triumphs, and kingdom of the Redeemer. Some give one view of these subjects, and some another: but all agree in the general outlines; all confirm each other's testimony; and in no one instance is there a discordant voice; or any thing that can be thought so, by those who diligently examine and compare the whole. This combination of testimony gives prophecy its full force; and connected with its accomplishment, amounts to a complete moral demonstration, that the Scriptures are the oracles of God.

'The prophecy is writ, part in Hebrew, part in Chaldee; for which this reason may be assigned; that those parts, in which the Babylonian empire was concerned, were writ in their language, viz. from ii. 4, to the end of the seventh chapter; a great part of which was probably entered in their public registers.' (Lowth.)

From the consideration, that this eminent and greatly beloved servant of God was, to extreme old age, and probably till his death, a minister of state in a heathen court, we may conclude with observing, that faith and piety are not confined to any place or station in life, but that the Lord can preserve his people humble and spiritual in the midst of all possible snares, and in the most entangling employments to which his providence calls them.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, 2 Kings xxiv. 1. Ezra i. 1—4. Jer. xxv. 1.) This may be considered as the first date of the beginning of the seventy years' captivity: for it has been shown, that there were several. At this time Jehoiakim became tributary to the king of Babylon; and consequently the seventy years of captivity and vasalage began. (Lowth.) He carried the sacred vessels to the temple of his God; not so much for the ordinary use of his priests, as to be laid up for monuments in the treasure-house that pertained to his idol; even Bel, the god of the Babylonians, &c. (Bp. Hall.)

V. 3—7. It is evident, that Daniel and his companions were carried captive with Jehoiakim, though it be not here mentioned: for this was previous to the captivity of Jehoiachin. The eastern monarchs have in every age been accustomed to employ eunuchs in their palaces and about their persons: and as these frequently were advanced to the highest dignities, the original is sometimes used in general for a courtier, or officer in the palace. It is probable, however, that Daniel and his companions were eunuchs. The master of the eunuchs on this occasion, received orders from Nebuchadnezzar to select from the young men of Israel, and especially from those of royal and noble birth, such as were unblemished in their outward form, and of comely figure, who had good capacities, and had received the rudiments of a good education; and whose prudence, good sense, and learning, might render them fit to occupy some station at court. It was then, as well as at present, deemed a branch of magnificence to be served by foreigners: perhaps the king had observed several of the young Jews to be very ingenious, and of promising abilities; and he desired to avail himself of the talents both of his native subjects, and of those whom he had acquired by conquest. These young men were to be instructed in the language and learning of the Chaldeans, and in every science that could qualify them for service. Three years were allotted to finish their education: and to encourage them to be diligent and obsequious, they were to be supplied with viands and wines every day from the king's own table. This education would tend, and probably was meant, to detach them from the interests of their people and religion, and to attach them to those of their new masters. Amongst the number selected, there were four more distinguished and conscientious than the rest: their names were all compounded with the original words for God, or Lord: Daniel signifying "God my Judge;" Hananiah, the grace of the Lord; and Azariah, the Lord is a help. It is not agreed what Mishael signifies; but it is compounded with EL, the name of God. But the master of the eunuchs changed these names for others compounded with the names of the idols of Babylon; as intimating the change he expected, or desired, in their religion. The word rendered children is frequently used for young persons when come to maturity: and it is the common opinion, that Daniel was at this time twenty years of age. Indeed we must suppose, from the narrative, that both he and his companions were at least seventeen or eighteen. As these young men were of the seed-royal, it is probable that some of them were descended from Hezekiah; and thus the prophecy concerning his posterity was exactly fulfilled. 9 Now God had brought Daniel into favour and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs.

10 And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces * worse liking than the children which are of your † sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king.

V. 8-16. It is probable that Daniel first formed his determination, and then brought over his companions to his views and purpose. He did not consider it as unlawful to learn the sciences and language, as a preparation for future usefulness: and we may hence decidedly conclude, they were not required to study the arts of the magicians and astrologers. He resolved, however, not to defile himself with the king's meat. Many of the dishes would consist, in part at least, of those meats which were unclean according to the law; others of them would be such as had been offered to idols: and the wine, it is probable, had been presented to them, and a part from it poured out for a libation on their altars. Daniel no doubt concluded that by eating and drinking of these provisions he should have fellowship with idolaters; and be corrupted with the prevailing luxury and intemperance of the court, as well as induced to eat such meats as the law of God forbade: and that such a self-indulgent course of life was neither suited to the afflicted state of his country, nor to his own condition as a captive, or to his character as a devoted worshipper of the God of Israel. He was therefore resolved not to defile himself; yet he did not rudely refuse what was intended in kindness; but gently and modestly requested the prince, or master, of the eunuchs, to indulge him in this respect, as his conscience was concerned in it: yet it is hardly probable that he would have succeeded quietly in his purpose, had not that God whom he so conscientiously served, given him a place in the esteem and tender compassionate regard of this stranger; by means of the excellent abilities, discretion, courteousness, and amiable qualities, with which God had endued him. He was therefore disposed to gratify Daniel: but he feared lest the king, who had given orders about the diet of the young Jews, should observe any of them to look unhealthy and dejected, (as he took it for granted they would, if they lived on pulse and water:) so that comparing their countenances with those who were not so scrupulous, he should inquire into the cause of the difference; and finding that his orders had been disobeyed, should in a rage order him to be put to death. The subsequent history shows that he had some ground, in the character of the king, for these apprehensions. It seems, however, that he was willing to connive at the desired change, though he would not order it; and perhaps he hinted to Daniel, that Melzar, his deputy, could do it with less danger: at least Daniel applied to him, and besought that a trial might be made for the space of ten days: during which time he and his friends would live upon pulse, or vegetables, and water, without any kind of animal food or wine: and if on this spare diet they did not thrive as well as those who ate the king's portion, he might afterwards refuse his concurrence. This temperate diet would be in its own nature wholesome; yet it was not suited to render them fatter in flesh than the others: but doubtless Daniel's confidence was placed on the special blessing of God, to render it so nourishing, that he and his friends might no more be tempted to defile themselves. It cannot, however, be supposed, that he would in any case have consented to eat forbidden food, whatever sufferings his refusal might have exposed them to. But the Lord did not disappoint his expectation; for his looks and that of his friends fully satisfied Melzar, that he might safely leave them to their own plan; and so he took away, perhaps as a perquisite to himself, the portion that was allotted them from the king's table. This was a singular instance of conscientious temperance and self-denial in young persons, who had been brought up in affluence. (Marg. Ref. Notes Ex. ii. 21.)

V. 17-20. It pleased God so to prosper the instructions given to Daniel and his friends, and their application to study; and so to communicate knowledge and wisdom from himself, that they far excelled their fellow students in every thing; and Daniel was early endued with the supernatural ability of interpreting remarkable dreams, as Joseph had been in Egypt; (for he alone was chosen to be a prophet.) So that when they were brought before the king, (who appears to have been a man of learning and penetration,) they were found far better qualified for his service than any of the other students; nay, they far excelled in learning and in the satisfactory solution of difficult questions, all the magicians and astrologers, and other pretenders to extraordinary discoveries, with which his realm abounded. They were therefore speedily advanced to honourable stations in his palace: and Daniel continued to be employed in the affairs of government, and to be regarded as a prophet, through the whole duration of the Chaldean monarchy; and till Cyrus succeeded to the kingdom, on the death of his father-in-law, Darius the Mede. Thus he lived to witness the conclusion of the seventy years, which Jeremiah had predicted as the term of the captivity: and there can be no reasonable doubt, but that Cyrus' favourable decree was procured by his means. Indeed it is evident that he survived that event at least two or three years. (x 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7.

The successes of ungodly men, even in their enterprises against the worshippers of God, are to be ascribed to his interposition: they could have no power against them, "except it were given them from above;" though they either take the glory of it to themselves, or give it to their idols. The Lord will permit his enemies to profane even those things which have been consecrated to his service, when they have been polluted by the hypocrisy or crimes of those who have been favoured with them. It is the presence of princes to employ the abilities and endowments of body or mind, and every qualification natural or acquired, which are to be found among every class of their subjects: and it is the wisdom of God thus to bring forth into scenes of usefulness, those whom he hath qualified to serve the public, or his Church. He will sometimes have a few of his servants to stand in king's palaces, to direct the deliberations of senates, or to sway the affairs of kingdoms; as well as others to be employed in the work of the ministry, or in the obscure occupations of private life. We should therefore consider seriously what is our proper work, and do it diligently, and not converse with others who aim to glorify God in a different sphere.—Youth is the time for acquiring useful knowledge; nor is it superfluous for those who most simply seek wisdom from God, to apply their minds, and to employ their time, in pursuing various kinds of human learning. Kings, who would have able statesmen and servants, should encourage literature, and support men of abilities in prosecuting their studies; for they will find but few disposed to such pursuits, except they have a prospect of being comfortably supported, nay, liberally rewarded. How careful then should parents be, so to train up their children, that they may be qualified for future usefulness! But, alas! the education which is generally patronized by royal or public bounty, tends more to corrupt men's principles and morals, than to improve them; and to lead them from scriptural sentiments, language, and behaviour, to adopt the names, notions, habits, and phraseology of heathens: and instead of teaching youth to bridle their passions, and to exercise self-denial, it commonly initiates them in luxury, or confirms them in habits of licentiousness.

V. 8-20.

If the Lord hath put it into the heart of any young person, from pure principles, to purpose not to defile himself by any unlawful or inexpedient indulgence, he will enable him to obtain the benefit, and to escape the dangers of every situation. But this will require much command over the appetites; and much firmness, meekness, and prudence will also be requisite, to avoid giving needless offence: for, even where conscience and duty are concerned, modest persuasion and entreaty are preferable to impetuosity, moroseness, and obstinacy. When the Lord sees good, he can bring his servants into favour and tender love even with strangers to true religion: and indeed the genuine spirit of Christianity, when connected with the meekness of wisdom and superior abilities, is exceedingly amiable and conciliating even in the eyes of ungodly men, where it does not interfere with their pride, lusts, and interests. They who first form salutary designs will seldom be left alone in them; though few in general will concur, compared with the numbers who prefer present indulgence or interest to duty. Temperance, nay, abstinence, is more consistent with health, than men are apt to believe, who seek excuses for self-indulgence. Yet there may be reasons, when a degree of abstemiousness is needful, which in other circumstances would not be proper. If this be undertaken by any man in the fear of God, and not from Pharisaical pride or affectation, or with a spirit of censoriousness; but either that he may not defile himself by an improper intercourse with ungodly men, or that he may keep under his body and bring it into subjection: he may expect a peculiar blessing on his spare diet, to support his health, and to fit him for active service; without burdening his conscience or "making provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." And though a regard to health is a general duty; yet there may be cases,

CHAP. II.

Nebuchadnezzar, perplexed with a dream which he had forgotten, requires, with menaces and promises, his wise men to make it known to him, with the interpretation, 1—9. They acknowledge their inability, and are sentenced to die, 10—13. Daniel obtains respite, joins in prayer with his friends, has the dream revealed to him, and blesses God, 14—23. He stays the decree, and is brought before the king, 24—30. The dream and its interpretation, 31—45. The king honours Daniel; and confesses that his God is pre-eminent above all gods, 46, 47. AND ^a in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, ^b Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams, where-with his spirit was troubled, ^c and his sleep brake from him.

2 Then the king ^d commanded to call the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans, for to shew the king his dreams. So they came and stood before the king.

3 And the king said unto them, ^e I have dreamed a dream, and my spirit was troubled to know the dream.

4 Then spake the Chaldeans to the king ^f in Syriac, ^g O king, live for ever: ^h tell thy servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation.

when the care of keeping a conscience void of offence will render even this a subordinate consideration; which may in a measure be overlooked, upon the same principle that the offending right hand must be cut off, and that the martyr yields up his life rather than sin against God. When men see it necessary to purpose such designs in their hearts, and to mention them even to those who have a tender love for them, they will often find them a hinderance to their designs, out of fear, either respecting them, or on their own account. When, however, the trial is made, such fears are often found to have been mere temptations: and conscientious temperance will always be found more beneficial, even to the comfort of this present life, than sinful indulgence. It also exceedingly tends to fit a man for study, or any great and continued mental exertion: and pious young men should endeavour to excel their fellows in every useful pursuit; not that they may be praised, but for the honour of the Gospel, and that they may be qualified for usefulness. For whatever station or service the Lord intends men, he will give them suitable endowments: and the wisdom that he bestows, is ten thousand times better than worldly policy, curious arts, or the most admired attainments of human learning; both for the management of secular concerns, and with respect to the eternal world. It is a happiness to the realm, and an honour to the prince, when he is competent to judge who are best qualified to serve him, and when he impartially prefers them on that account. A youth spent in temperance and piety, and in departing from evil, conduces to durable usefulness and eminency, and treasures up joys for the future, either on earth, or in heaven, or both. Let then young men keep their eyes steadily fixed on the examples of this chapter: let us all count every thing but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, and the experience of his salvation; and always remember, that God will "honour those that honour him," but that they "who despise him shall be lightly esteemed."

Babylon when he came up to Jerusalem, and carried away Daniel and his friends to Babylon; which was in the first year of his reign: yet after Daniel had been three years educating, he is said to have had this dream in the second year of his reign. Hence it is concluded that he reigned some time along with his father; and that this was in the second year of his reigning alone. He was convinced that his dream was supernatural, and was troubled about it, though he could not recollect particulars: God so ordering it, that he might bring Daniel forth into notice, to make known his own glory, as the God of Israel and of the whole earth. 'Though it was but one dream, it contained divers scenes of affairs, being a description of the succession of the four monarchies, which were to continue, under different forms, to the end of the world.' (Lowth.) Rather the fourth will continue, in one form or other, till all the kingdoms of the world become the kingdom of Christ.

V. 2. 'The word rendered Sorcerers is always taken in an ill sense by the holy writers, for those who consult evil spirits. The Chaldeans were so much addicted to the study of the heavenly motions, and to make prognostications from thence; that the word Chaldean is used both in Greek and Latin writers for an astrologer.— Daniel and his companions did not appear among them: perhaps the Chaldeans despised them as youths and strangers.' (Lowth.)

V. 4. In Syriac. Or, Chaldee: these were then the same language, or, as some think, the Syriac was a more elegant dialect of the Chaldee, chiefly used by the learned. From this verse to the end of the seventh chapter Daniel wrote in Chaldee, and not in Hebrew: probably in order to induce the Chaldeans to read the account of those transactions, which so greatly concerned them. The expression, "O king live for ever" was a customary salutation, implying a cordial desire of his life, health, and permanent felicity; it was used by Daniel and other pious men, as well as by the heathens, though probably with more extensive meaning; and was equivalent to "God save the king," as in use among us. V. 5—9. Nothing could be more unreasonable than this demand of Nebuchadnezzar, or more tyrannical and cruel than the sentence annexed to it. The whole narration displays the arrogance, impetuosity, and violence of his character; and illustrates the evil tendency and fatal effect of arbitrary power, constant homage and flattery, and uninterrupted prosperity, on the mind of fallen man. Being eager to recover the recollection of his dream, he required of the wise men, what was impossible, except by revelation from God! And he threatened them with the most terrible death; with the deepest ignominy to their characters and family, if they did not immediately perform what he required: but if they did, he promised to reward them in the most liberal and honourable manner. When they reasonably desired to be informed of the dream, and promised to give the interpretation by the rules of their art, (which they never could have performed,) he construed this into a fraudulent intention of gaining time and opportunity for the execution of some corrupt design. Perhaps, being terrified by his dream, he expected some sudden revolution; and he might even suspect them of having formed some bad designs against him; so that he supposed they waited till the time was changed, and the event had deprived him of the power of punishing them: but he was determined to know it directly, or to execute his barbarous intentions. If they could discover the dream, it would give a sanction to their interpretation of it: but otherwise he should conclude them to be base impostors.

V. 10—13. The resolute conduct of the king led the Chaldeans and magicians, not only to confess the impotency of their arts, and to remonstrate that no king ever made such a demand on any who professed these sciences; but to declare that the discovery was beyond the reach of all human or created penetration, and only known and discoverable by the gods, whose dwelling was not with flesh, or among men. This they spoke of their gods: but the only living and true God, who alone could reveal the secrets contained in this dream, indeed condescends to dwell among men: and he actually made known the dream to Daniel, and so showed the difference between JEHOVAH and his prophets, and the idols and magicians of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar was the more exasperated by this reply, and immediately issued a decree to destroy all the wise men of Babylon: and whether in his inconsiderate rage he meant so, or whether he spoke in such general terms as to admit of this construction, Daniel and his fellows also were sought for to be put to death. Otherwise, the sorcerers would deservedly have been put to death, without rendering the city less wise than before. But the dream would have remained an impenetrable secret; which God had purposed it should not be.

V. 14—16. As Daniel and his friends had not been summoned with the other wise men; and yet were supposed to be involved with them in the condemnation pronounced against them, it was most-reasonable, that they should have a hearing from the king. It seems that Daniel had, at times, access to him. Arioch appears to 17 Then Daniel went to his house, and made the thing known to ^h Hananiah, ⁱ Michael, and ^j Azariah, his companions:

 18 That ^b they would desire mercies ^k * of the God of heaven concerning this secret; that [†] Daniel and his fellows should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon.

19 Then ^e was the secret revealed unto Daniel ^q in a night vision. Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven.

20 Daniel answered and said, ^e Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever: ^f for wisdom and might are his:

21 And ^h he changeth the times and the seasons: ^h he removeth kings, and setteth up kings: ⁱ he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding:

22 He ^h revealeth the deep and secret things: ⁱ he knoweth what is in the darkness, ^m and the light dwelleth with him.

23 I ^a thank thee, and praise thee, ^o O thou God of my fathers, ^p who hast given me wisdom and might, ^q and hast made known unto me now what we desired of thee: for thou hast ^{now} made known unto us the king's matter.

24 ¶ Therefore Daniel went in unto Arioch, whom the king had ordained to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him, ^h Destroy not the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king, and I will shew unto the king the interpretation.

25 Then Arioch ^t brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him, [†] I have found a man of [†] the captives of Judah, that will make known unto the king the interpretation.

26 The king answered and said to ^h Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, ^u Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof?

27 Daniel answered in the presence of the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded ^v cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew unto the king:

28 But there is ^z a God in heaven ^a that revealeth secrets, and [†] maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be ^b in the latter day. Thy dream, and the visions of thy head upon thy bed, are these;

have favoured his application; the king's fury was perhaps abated; and it pleased God to dispose his heart to regard the proposal of his servant. Daniel had before this understanding in dreams and visions, (i. 17.) but he would not have so confidently promised the desired information to the king, had he not received some intimation from God that it would in due time be communicated. No doubt, he was actuated by a zeal for the honour of God and of true religion, as well as by a desire of preserving his own life and that of his friends.

V. 17-23. After the united prayers of this pious company, the secret was revealed to Daniel, in so distinct and clear a manner, that he had no doubt of its being a divine inspiration, and that it would approve itself as such to Nebuchadnezzar. He therefore immediately praised God, as the Fountain of all wisdom and knowledge, and the Author of all those revolutions in empires, of which he had so vast a view before his mind, and which were to take place through a long succession of ages: and he rendered thanks and praise, in the most exalted language, to him for this extraordinary revelation, in a time of such imminent danger. 'His wisdom appears in ordering the great affairs of the world; and his might and power in bringing them to pass.' (Jer. xxxii. 19.) (Lowth.) The revelation made to Daniel, gave him not only wisdom, but power, to save many lives, and do immense good to his people.

V. 24. The rash decree of the king had doomed to one common destruction, not only the sorcerers, but all those in Babylon who were considered as wise and learned men: but Daniel was honoured as the willing instrument of preserving all their lives. The Lord, in answer to the benevolent prayers of him and his friends, spared the whole company. (Acts xxvii. 24.)

V. 25. 'Daniel undertook to do it, of his own accord: but this officer, according to the manner of courtiers, takes this opportunity of ingratiating himself with the king: as if the discovery of Daniel's abilities in this kind was owing purely to his diligence.' (Lowth.) Indeed Arioch seems to have claimed some merit to himself; yet he also spoke as one that was glad to be excused from the bloody and odious service that had been assigned him, revealed to me, for any wisdom that I have more than any living, ° but for * their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king, † and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart.

31 ¶ Thou, O king, † sawest, and beheld a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; † and the form thereof was terrible.

32 This image's † head was of fine gold, his † breast and his arms of silver, his † belly and his † thighs of brass.

33 His † legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay.

34 Thou sawest till that † a stone was ° cut out † without hands, † which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces.

35 Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became † like the chaff of the summer-threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that † no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image † became a great mountain, † and filled the whole earth.

36 This is the † vision, and † we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king.

37 Thou, O king, art † a king of kings: for † the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, † power, and strength, and glory.

38 And whosoever the children of men dwell, † the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. † Thou art this head of gold.

39 And after thee shall rise † another kingdom inferior to thee, and † another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth.

disgraced human nature. The third kingdom, represented by the belly and thighs of the image, formed of brass, must be that of the Macedonians, or Grecians, which succeeded to the Persian monarchy. This was established by the conquests of Alexander the Great, and continued under his successors. It had less external magnificence than those which preceded; and it was founded and supported by force of arms, many of which were anciently made of brass: but it was more extensive than either of the others, including many dominions in Europe, as well as those of the Persians in Asia and Africa, and many regions further to the east, than they had ever penetrated. It was therefore foretold, that this kingdom would bear rule over all the earth; which may also allude to the vainglorious boast of Alexander, that he had subdued the whole world. The Persians were not inferior in dignity, power, and riches; but were worse, touching ambition, cruelty, and all kinds of vice; showing that the world would grow worse and worse, till it was restored by Christ.

V. 40—43. These verses evidently describe the Roman empire, as succeeding to that of the Macedonians. It was as strong as iron, and like iron it brake and subdued all before it. No people ever made such extensive conquests, through so many ages, as the Romans did: in the former part of their prosperity, they were remarkable only for valour, hardness, frugality, and poverty, of which iron is a proper emblem. The two consuls by which they were long governed, and the eastern and western empires, into which their dominions were at length divided, might be denoted by the two legs and feet on which the image stood; and the ten toes, into which the feet divided, represented the ten kingdoms into which at length the whole empire was broken. The civil wars which weakened the state, and the conjunction of the Romans with the conquered nations, and afterwards with the Goths, Vandals, and other barbarians who subverted the empire, was denoted by the compounding of the iron with the potter's clay, which cannot unite or strengthen each other. Thus the Roman empire decayed in strength, even when it was growing more extensive: at length it began evidently to decline, till it was divided into many subordinate kingdoms. This is also represented by the Romans mingling themselves with the seed of men, or of other nations, by alliances and intermarriages, which tended to the subversion of the empire. Yet this monarchy still subsists in the toes, or kingdoms into which it was broken, and of which we shall hereafter have occasion to speak more particularly. (Marg. Ref.) The chief power in these ten kingdoms shall be partly secular, and partly ecclesiastical: and the encroaching of the ecclesiastical power upon the secular, shall be the occasion of frequent clashing between them, to the weakening of both parties, and endangering their breaking to pieces. (Louth.) These four monarchies, probably the mightiest which ever appeared on earth, have certainly been far more celebrated than any others. The history of them, in fact, comprises the grand transactions of mankind from the days of Daniel to this present time. The Church of God likewise has had vastly more concern with these, than with any other empires; the countries belonging to them have hitherto been the chief seat of the Redeemer's kingdom, which will be rendered universal by the total subversion of the last of them. It cannot therefore be wondered, that so many more prophecies should be inserted in the sacred oracles, concerning these four kingdoms, than about other nations and empires.

V. 44, 45. In the days of those kings, or during the prevalence of the Roman authority, the God of heaven had determined to set up another kingdom, which would never be destroyed, or fall under the power of any conquerors; seeing it would break in pieces, and consume all these kingdoms, and stand for ever. This was represented by "a stone cut out without hands," which smote the image and utterly destroyed it, and became a great mountain that filled the whole earth. (Note, 34, 35.) The stone was entirely distinct from the image, nay, directly opposite to it and all its interests: it must therefore mean a kingdom set up by the power of God, without the concurrence of human policy or force, and in opposition

46 ¶ Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation, and sweet odours unto him.

47 The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldst reveal this secret.

48 Then the king made Daniel a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wisemen of Babylon.

49 Then Daniel requested of the king, and he sat Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon: but Daniel sat in the gate of the king.

to all the authority and combined efforts of the princes of this world. The kingdom of Christ was evidently intended: from small beginnings, it hath already made a vast progress: it hath subverted, and will continue to subvert, Pagan and Antichristian kingdoms, and to entirely destroy and disperse them: and at length it will triumph over all opposition, and become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth. This part of the prophecy yet remains to be accomplished: so that we have in this dream a most extraordinary prophetic abstract of the most signal events, that would take place, through all succeeding ages, nearly to the consummation of all things. As far as the accomplishment hath proceeded, it hath been most exact and undeniable; and future ages shall be filled with astonishment and awe, by witnessing this Stone, cut out without hands, destroying the remaining toes of this image, and universally triumphant. Thus the great God made known to this heathen prince what was afterwards to come to pass; and the dream was certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.

V. 46 - 49. Nebuchadnezzar was so astonished by Daniel's so exactly declaring his dream, and showing him such wonderful events couched under it, that he thought him a deity, and attempted to render him adoration with sacrifices and incense. Doubtless Daniel withdrew him from his purpose, and informed him more fully, to whom the honour was due; upon which he acknowledged the God of Daniel to be "a God of gods," &c. Yet he seems not to have been convinced, that it was necessary for him to renounce idolatry, and to become his worshipper and servant. He however greedily preferred and enriched Daniel, and at his request he preferred his companions also; but Daniel became one of his chief ministers. No doubt they accepted of these preferments, in hopes of rendering some service to their people and religion, as well as of doing some general good to mankind. Hence it is plain, that hitherto there were no religious tests or observances required by the king, previous to their admission to places of trust and authority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13.

No greatness or prosperity can secure so much as an undisturbed night's sleep; and when the Lord pleases he can render men miserable even by uneasy dreams. He hath various methods of making known his purposes; in order to manifest his own glory, to draw men's attention to his servants, and to evidence the authenticity of his sacred oracles. Men are generally more eager to gratify their curiosity, or to dive into futurity, than to learn the way of salvation or the path of duty: yet all foreknowledge of future events tends to increase anxiety and trouble; except as it is counterpoised by submission to the will, and confidence in the wisdom, truth, and love of God. They who attend on the courts of princes, learn the language of benevolence; but the most emphatical wishes of health, life, or salvation, are frequently unmeaning compliments, which run counter to the real desires of their hearts. Yet Christians may often use the same words in sincerity; praying for kings and all in authority, that they may properly fill up their high stations on earth, and also live for ever in the felicity of heaven. It is a great evil, when multitudes are subjected to the arbitrary sway of one capricious and haughty tyrant, who may imperiously command the most absurd and impossible things; who having been long humoured, can brook no denial or delay; and who deals about death, without feeling or remorse, on the most inoffensive of his subjects. Such rulers are generally extremely jealous and suspicious, and apt to misconstrue the most reasonable actions or expressions into rebellion and treason: and the rewards that they confer when gratified, are a very inadequate counterbalance for the miseries they inflict when enraged; in which they generally involve the innocent with the guilty. We should therefore be thankful to live under a limited monarchy, in which our sovereign is authorized and enabled to do as much good as he will, but has no legal power of doing injustice. Yet we should remember that God is just, even when men are most unjust; and that they who fall victims to the cruel jealousy of unreasonable tyrants, often on other accounts deserve their doom. The Lord also orders every event, as may best detect the folly and imposture of those varied delusions, which succeed one another in the world, and the insufficiency of all human power, wisdom, and penetration: that by the confession even of those who oppose his truth, when baffled in their devices, it may appear, that the discoveries he makes and the operations he performs, are impossible to all others. But the views of the most sagacious of ungodly men are strangely confused, in respect of the glorious Lord of all; they have a faint idea of his pre-eminence, and of some of his perfections; but his majesty and mercy, his exaltation and condescension, his dwelling with human flesh to save and bless sinful men, and all the glories displayed in the great work of redemption, are wholly hidden from them: and they are more apt to conceive of God as distant, and as

CHAP. III.

Nebuchadnezzar sets up a golden image, and commands his officers, &c. when they hear all kinds of music, to fall down and worship it, on pain of being cast into a fiery furnace, 1—6. His orders are generally complied with, 7. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, are accused of disobedience, 8—12. The king vehemently threatens them, if they persist in refusal, defying any God to deliver them; but they answer calmly and resolutely, 13—19. They are cast into the furnace, the flame of which killeth those who threw them in, 20—23. The king is astonished, at seeing them walk unhurt in the fire, with a fourth like to the Son of God, 24, 25. They come forth; and all the vast company see that the fire has not touched them, 26, 27. He blesses God, and decrees severe punishment on those who speak against him, 28, 29. V. 14—30.

The furious rage of men who cannot, or will not distinguish between "the pure, peaceable, and holy wisdom which is from above," and that "which is earthly, sensual, and devilish," may involve the servants of God under the same condemnation with the vilest impostors; but he knows how to rescue them, and even to make their dangers the means of their greatest good. He directs them to a gentle and cautious deportment in the midst of the greatest injuries and perils: but whatever methods they adopt for retarding the purposes, or pacifying the rage, of wicked men; their grand means is to excite one another to prayer for mercies to the God of heaven, who is able to extricate them from every difficulty, and to keep them from perishing with the wicked. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him;" and though we do not expect such immediate revelations from God as Daniel was favoured with: yet he will answer our believing prayers for direction in every perplexity, show us whatever is for our good, and turn our fears and sorrows into grateful praises. Every renewed mercy should lead us to renew our adorations: we should remember the glorious perfections of our God, the honour of his kingdom, and the wise and righteous dispensations of his providence, who changes times and seasons, and removeth and setteth up kings: we should celebrate him as the Giver of knowledge and wisdom, as knowing what is in the darkness, and dwelling in inaccessible light; whilst we thank him for the favours bestowed on us, and for granting us the instruction, help, and encouragement, that we sought from him in our tribulations. But when the Lord peculiarly honours us before men, we must be sure to remember and acknowledge, that it is not for our sakes, but for his name's sake, and for the benefit of his Church, and for the conviction of his enemies, that there is indeed a God in heaven, that can reveal such secrets, and perform such works, as it never entered into the heart of the wisest man to conceive possible: of this the prophecies contained in the sacred scriptures, and fulfilling through the successive ages of the world, are a full demonstration to every considerate mind.

The most powerful and renowned empires, that have been erected on earth, are but as the baseless fabric of a disjointed vision, which vanisheth when we awake: they may excel in brightness and be very terrible, but they are only a vain pageant of glory and excellency; for these are substantially to be found in God and heavenly things alone. The kings and conquerors of the earth have in every age kept the nations in an uproar, by their ambitious projects, and the revolutions which they have occasioned. Some have been more eminent for wealth, some for power, some for hardy courage and ruinous success; their delight has been in destroying, subduing, breaking in pieces, and crushing mankind: one form of tyranny hath often been superseded by another still more base and barbarous: and men in general have been groaning under the effects of their contests and vices! But all human power and prowess tend to decay: many mighty empires have gradually been weakened, till they have been subverted by open enemies, or by intestine convulsions. In the midst of all these events the God of heaven is setting up his kingdom, not by human might or power, but by his word and Spirit. This does not interfere with the proper exercise of any human authority: but it will, by its secret operation, overturn and destroy all opposing or intervening power, break in pieces every antichrist, fill the earth, and continue for ever.—May we be the willing subjects of this kingdom, and spend our lives in seeking its peace and prosperity! It is natural for men to run into extremes; and either to despise and injure, or to idolize, those who speak the word of God to them: but our business is to direct their attention to the great Author and Giver of every good gift. Many have some general appreciations of the power and majesty of God, and that others ought to serve him, who yet have no serious thoughts of worshipping him themselves. He, however, over-rules even such convictions to bring his servants into those stations, in which they are to be employed: and they may consistently accept the favours offered them, when they give them an opportunity of doing good, and are not clogged with any sinful conditions. It behoves those who are advanced to be mindful of their former friends; but far more to use their influence in promoting the wise and righteous, that God may be glorified, and the best interests of mankind furthered by them.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1-7. It is not certain at what time the events of this chapter occurred. The Septuagint indeed says, that it was in the eighteenth year, that is, after Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream. Some think that Nebuchadnezzar had a reference in this image to that which he had seen; as if he would have one wholly of gold, and not be contented with being represented by the head of gold. It seems more probable that the impression of his dream was worn off, and his ambition and arrogance still further increased by success; that his attachment to idolatry was augmented by his victories over the people of JERUSALEM; and that this image was formed from the spoils of the conquered nations. It was of an enormous size, and must have cost immense treasure. The height of it was above thirty yards; but this being ten times its breadth or thickness, and out of all proportion, favours the conclusion, that the pedestal also on which it stood was taken in under the admeasurement. It was perhaps made hollow, but with plates of solid gold; and it was set up in an extensive plain near Babylon, which could contain a vast concourse of people, and was probably erected in honour of Bel, the chief idol of Babylon. Having completed the image, in order to render the worship of it more noticed, and to make the greater ostentation of his own magnificence and authority, Nebuchadnezzar summoned all his officers, civil and military, from every part of his extensive dominions, to attend on its dedication. When met together upon the plain, they were ordered by proclamation to fall down and worship this new made deity, of whatever nation they were: the signal for this act of adoration by the striking up of all kinds of musical instruments at once, might be intended to allure them by soothing strains to join in the worship, and inspire fervour into their supposed devotion. But to secure uniformity in this vast company, it was also proclaimed that every one who refused compliance, should immediately be cast into a burning fiery furnace. It does not appear that any were obliged to attend, who did not hold places under government: others would doubtless be there, and then they must comply; but these were constrained to be present, at a vast trouble and expense from every part of the empire: so that it was a sort of religious test, by which they were to approve themselves proper persons to be employed in the king's service; and as it is common on such occasions, there was a general conformity observed. Almost every person concerned was so overawed by the menaces and power of the king, or so allured by the hopes of ingratiating themselves with him: or so devoid of principle, knowledge, or conscience: or so attached to a pompous idolatry, that they unanimously observed the signal, and prostrated themselves in adoration of the golden image.— The several words, by which the different officers, and the various kinds of musical instruments, are enumerated, seem not to admit of any satisfactory explanation: for, without referring to ancient usages, they cannot be distinctly made intelligible, except to those few who are fully acquainted with those usages, and perhaps scarcely even to them.— 'The idol is not known for an idol, so long as he is with the workman: but when the ceremonies and customs are recited and used, and the consent of the people is there: then of a block they think they have made a god.'

know, that they would on no account at any time worship any of his gods, or now adore his golden image. When we consider the situation of these men; that they were strangers and captives, at a distance from the land and ordinances of God, and without any to countenance or encourage them; that they had been under great obligations to the king; that most of their countrymen, even when in their own land, were given up to idolatry; that they were not required to abjure the God of Israel, or to enter upon a constant course of idolatry, but merely in one instance to comply with the king's humour; and in such remarkable circumstances, when the whole empire was against them, and the fiery furnace before them: I say, when these things are duly considered, we shall perceive, that this instance of heroic constancy and intrepidity in a good cause, was scarcely ever equalled, and never was exceeded, by any mere man, since the beginning of the world. The language commonly used, and the pictures formed on this subject, have led people to think of these persons as children: but it seems far more probable, that they were in the full vigour of manhood, above thirty years of age, when this event took place.

V. 19—23. The decisive answer, returned by these pious Jews, threw the proud tyrant into the utmost excess of rage, which appeared in the perturbation of his countenance. To show his indignation at the supposed atrociousness of their conduct, he ordered the heat of the furnace to be increased seven-fold; which would only have shortened and lessened their torture, if the Lord had left them to be consumed in the flames. He selected the mightiest of his soldiers to cast them into the furnace; and bound them with their clothes on, as if he would secure the destruction of all that belonged to them. Thus they were cast bound into this tremendous furnace of fire, at the time when it was heated to that extreme degree, that the executioners were slain by the vehement flame which issued out of it. It is not improbable that they had been forward to comply with the king's orders, and to show their malice against the Jews; and thus they fell victims to their own evil dispositions. Every circumstance, however, served to illustrate the greatness of the miracle, in the preservation of those who fell down bound into the fiery furnace.

V. 24, 25. Some think that Nebuchadnezzar was astonished by the death of his mighty men, or by the terrors of his conscience: but it is more likely, that he saw at a distance the young men walking loose in the fiery furnace. It seems, that it was large enough to admit of their walking about in it, and was probably formed like those in which lime is at present burned. He called his counsellors to witness this astonishing incident: they had thrown three men bound into the fire; but now four were walking about, in the midst of the furnace; and the fourth was so glorious that he was like to a Son of God, or a holy angel. The fire, it seems, had power to burn their bonds, though not to singe their garments: they found no inconvenience, and felt no terror in the midst of this most vehement fire, nor any desire to come forth from it; they probably were employed in thankful praise and adoration of their great Deliverer, though the song ascribed to them in the Apocrypha is not genuine: and, whatever the king might mean by the fourth person being like the Son of God; it is probable, that it was indeed the eternal and coequal Son of the Father, and not a created angel. V. 26, 27. When the king had viewed this surprising scene, he was convinced of his error, and altered his conduct: he called to the pious Jews, by the honourable appellation of "the servants of the most high God," and ordered them to come forth. None could fetch them out, nor would they quit their place without being called from it. But they then came forth; and all the multitude of the chief persons, from every part of the empire, who witnessed the transaction, collected together to examine them; and found, to their unspeakable astonishment, that the fire had no power at all over their bodies, or even any effect upon their raiment. Thus they would be prepared to return to their several homes, and to circulate and authenticate in every province, the account of this wonderful interposition of the God of Israel in behalf of his faithful worshippers. And we cannot but suppose, that it had a happy effect upon the minds of many individuals, and tended to check the progress of idolatry, and to promote the worship of the living God.

V. 23, 29. This transaction seems to have produced deep convictions in the mind of Nebuchadnezzar: inso-much, that at the time he rendered adoration before all his princes to the God of Israel, who had sent his Angel to deliver his servants: he allowed, that they had done right in trusting in the Lord; and in rather yielding up their bodies to the flame, than worship any other but their own God. And (as if he were resolved at all events to be a persecutor,) he decreed most terrible punishments to those, who dared to speak a word against the God of Shadrach, &c.; seeing no other God could deliver after that manner. But his convictions were transient, his pride was unhumbled; and no abiding change at this time took place in his disposition and conduct; as will appear from the extraordinary narration of the ensuing chapter.

V. 30. The Septuagint adds at the end of this verse, 'And he advanced them to be governors over all the Jews that were in his kingdom.' That translation, indeed, contains, in this chapter, several circumstances, which are not in the original; while the death of the mighty men, who cast Shadrach, &c. into the furnace, is omitted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1--7.

Ungodly men commonly spare no cost in gratifying their pride and lusts; and the devotees of idolatry and superstition are often equally profuse about their false worship: surely then the servants of God should not be niggardly in showing their attachment to his cause and service! Pride and bigotry combine in disposing princes to require from their subjects conformity to their religion, whether right or wrong: and, alas! there are but few in comparison, even among professed Christians, that can give a much better reason for their religious observances, than the Babylonians could for worshipping the golden image which the king had set up! When worldly interest allures, and sanguinary statutes terrify, seldom any great number will refuse compliance; but fear, or hope, will procure the golden image far more worshippers, than will adhere to the God of heaven! Such conformity and uniformity, are perfectly easy to the slothful, the careless, the sensual, and the infidel, that is, to a vast majority in most communities; whose worship, if paid at all, springs more from habit, interest, love of ease, or desire of obtaining the ruler's favour, than from regard to the authority and commandments of God. Satan hath ever studied to entice men into antiscritptural modes of worship by external splendour, and whatever could enchant the senses, enliven the imagination, or move the affections: and even music, though consecrated to the service of the sanctuary, and capable of good improvement in subserviency to devotion; has been, and is often, wretchedly abused to the vilest purposes: it should therefore be used in religious ordinances with jealousy and caution, lest it should produce a false fervour, and subserve the cause of vice, delusion, superstition, or enthusiasm.

V. 8--23.

Whilst the multitude, in every age, nation, and rank in society, are servile in compliance with the will of their superiors, and ready to obey any laws about religion, which can conduce to their outward ease, safety, or emolument, without fear of God or regard to conscience; there will be a few witnesses for the truth in the most degenerate times, who will dare to be singular, and to venture all consequences in obeying God rather than man. These will be sure to meet with malicious accusers; especially if the liberty, favour, or property they enjoy, be worth envying, or coveting. Their enemies will pretend to be the only loyal and dutiful subjects to their prince, and to be zealous for his welfare, the honour of the law, and the quiet of the realm: and they will represent the pious scruples of the servants of God, as arising from contumacy, contempt of authority, and disaffection to the government, and as deserving of the severest punishment denounced by the most cruel laws. They will not, if they can help it, let such statutes remain unexecuted; and they will plead, that

Nebuchadnezzar proclaims to all nations the Lord's dealings with him, adding benevolent salutations and admiring praises, 1—3. He states that he had a dream which the magicians could not interpret, 4—7; and that he related it to Daniel, 8—18; who interpreted it, 19—27. The dream fulfilled in Nebuchadnezzar's loss of dignity, reason, and almost the human form, for a season, 28—33; but being restored, he humbly and fervently adores and praises God, 34—37.

if the religious tenets of the persecuted do not deserve punishment, yet their obstinacy and contempt of legal authority do. Thus princes have often been wrought up to the highest pitch of rage and fury against their most useful and inoffensive subjects, and their most faithful servants: and Christians have been dragged as the vilest malefactors before kings and rulers; and put to the dreadful alternative, either to risk the everlasting wrath of God by deliberate disobedience to his commandments, or to suffer every torture that the infernal rage and cruelty of man could devise. They who have been long accustomed to be obeyed with unreserved servility, and to overpower all opposition, can often scarcely conceive of a power above them, or a God able to deliver his servants out of their hands: but their impious boasts and proud menaces are real kindnesses to the persecuted, who need not be careful or fearful, in answering under such circumstances. Indeed these fiery trials will not suit the superficial or hypocritical; their fear of man, and love of the world, and want of fear or love to God, and above all, their want of faith, will concur in rendering them apostates in the time of temptation. Nor will every real believer be able to stand with serene and unshaken fortitude, when first cast into such a trying situation. But the Lord will strengthen his people's faith in the time of need: and a firm reliance on the divine wisdom, power, truth, and mercy, together with peace of conscience, and an assured joyful hope of heaven, will gradually compose their minds, and determine them to venture all consequences rather than sin against the Lord. He is as able as ever to preserve the lives of his servants, in the most imminent perils, to support them under the most exquisite sufferings, and abundantly to recompense all their losses for his sake. A firm persuasion of these truths will fortify the soul against temptations to prevaricate, or to be ashamed of Christ: for no plea of necessity, danger, obligation, or example, will be sufficient, if we deliberately break God's commandments for the sake of temporal safety or advantage. We should be meek in our replies, "not rendering railing for railing," for "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God:" but we must also be decisive, that we will obey God rather than man, and take the consequences.

V. 24—30.

A firm and resolute conduct, however calm and prudent, will greatly enrage proud persecutors, whose furious countenances both show the misery of being the slaves of their own passions, and prove whose children they are, and what master they serve; but this does not render them more to be feared; for at most they can only kill the body, and by increasing the intensity, they decrease the duration of the sufferings that they inflict, and only expose their own folly and impotency. But what unknown guilt have persecutors to answer for! The crimes of their numerous instruments will in some sense be chargeable on them: and the souls of the murderers, (if not their lives also,) as well as the blood of the murdered, will be required at their hands. It must then be infinitely dangerous to all, whether principals or accessaries, to meddle with this diabolical business: and could we see into the eternal world, we should behold the persecuted believer safe from the malice of his foes: and the willing executioners of the unjust rage of persecutors, enduring the wrath of God in unquenchable fire. The Lord can render every furnace of affliction, and the bed of death, nay, the rack, or the flames, the scenes of sweet communion between him and his people. Their sufferings only tend to loosen their bonds, and to set them at liberty from sin and the world: they may be comfortable in any situation, by the manifested presence of the Son of God; and this may be so evident, as even to fill their persecutors with astonishment and dismay. The Lord can soon convince the most proud that he is above them, and show them the madness and folly of their rebellion: he will effectually "cause the wrath of man to turn to his "praise, and restrain the remainder of it:" he can extort adorations even from his enemies; and make all men see how wise, safe, and happy they are, who adhere to his service, in seasons of peculiar danger and difficulty. He can make those instrumental in stopping the mouths of blasphemers, and in promoting the knowledge of his great name, who have no real love to him: and he can render the sufferings of his people conducive to their temporal as well as eternal good. "O LORD God of hosts, blessed is "the man, who putteth his trust in thee!" Finally, let us remember, that he, who preserved these pious Jews in the fiery furnace, is able to uphold us in the hour of sharp temptation, to keep us from falling into sin, in the most unfavourable circumstances, and "to present us "faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding "joy."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. This chapter no doubt contains the exact words of Nebuchadnezzar's proclamation, which Daniel was directed to insert in his prophecy; and thus it received the sanction of divine inspiration. Nebuchadnezzar was induced to send the wonderful narrative of those things that had happened to him, connected with his sentiments concerning them, into every part of his extensive dominions, whilst he was under that impression of divine things which they had made upon his mind.—We have repeatedly found this haughty monarch under some general convictions, concerning the pre-eminent power and majesty of JEHOVAH; yet it was also evident, that there was no gracious change in his disposition and conduct: but the beginning and the conclusion of this chapter lead us, at least, to hope that he was at last made a monument of the victorious power of divine grace, and the exceeding riches of divine mercy. Without any such pompous additions to his name, and style of king, as were generally customary: (Ezra vii. 12.) he addressed himself to all the inhabitants of the earth, meaning chiefly, but not exclusively, those of his own dominions. He began by wishing them peace, as the sum of all earthly blessings; which is the more observable, as he had spent his life in embroiling them in wars: he deemed it good thus publicly to declare the miraculous dealings of God with him; it was proper, reasonable, becoming, and useful; and he concluded with breaking out into admiration of the greatness and power of the wonderful works of the Lord, and an acknowledgment of his everlasting authority and kingdom. If we consider Nebuchadnezzar's previous character, and the most humiliating and distressing calamity which the chapter records, we shall be convinced that sullen silence, or outrageous blasphemy, was more to be expected from him, than such an adoration as this, of that God who had so exposed and abased him.

V. 4—7. 'God's particular judgment often resembles the general one, in coming suddenly and unexpectedly, when men indulge themselves in carnal security.'—(Louth.) After Nebuchadnezzar had successfully finished his wars, and the vast improvements and buildings which he made at Babylon, of which many authors have written copiously and as men filled with astonishment; he had uninterrupted peace, rest, and prosperity in his palace, and probably expected to end his days in tranquil enjoyment: but he was suddenly alarmed by a remarkable dream, and by his thoughts upon his bed concerning it. According to custom, therefore, he published an edict, commanding the attendance of all his wise men, that they might interpret the dream to him: but, though on a former occasion they had promised to interpret his dream if he would declare it to them; yet they were not able at this time to do it. Perhaps they thought that some calamity was foreboded, but not being able to determine any thing distinctly about it, they did not choose to risk the consequence of a conjectural interpretation, but rather to submit to the disgrace of not being able to interpret it, as no other punishment was denounced.

V. 8, 9. Whether the king consulted the other wise men to prove them, before he applied to Daniel; or whether he would rather have received the desired information from them, than from him; he could scarcely avoid recollecting, that Daniel had formerly shown him both his dream and the interpretation of it. In relating this conference he observed, that Daniel was also called Belteshazzar, according to the name of his god, Bel, or Belus; as he had formerly worshipped this idol as his god, though when he wrote this he worshipped the God of heaven; (37;) and that in Daniel was the Spirit of the holy Gods, or of the Holy God: the name of God being plural in the Hebrew, though generally used with a singular adjective or verb. He next noticed, that he had addressed Daniel, as the master of the magicians; as being pre-eminent among all the reputedly wise men of Babylon: for he had not at that time learned to distinguish betwixt a prophet of the Lord and these impostors, except as he deemed Daniel more skilful than they. Convinced, however, that he spake by the Spirit of the holy Gods, or the Lord God of Israel, and that no secret was so concealed from him, as to occasion him any perturbation of mind, he earnestly desired him to interpret his visions, the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it.

13 I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and, behold, a watcher and a holy One came down from heaven;

14 He cried aloud, and said thus, Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches; shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit; let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches.

15 Nevertheless, leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth.

16 Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let seven times pass over him.

V. 10-18. As the king lay asleep, he dreamed that he saw a tree, in the centre of the earth, (conceiving of it as of a wide extended plain;) of so enormous a height and size, that its top reached to heaven, and it was visible to the extremity of the earth. This tree was covered with an exuberance of beautiful leaves, and loaded with immense quantities of fruit; its branches formed a covert for the beasts of the field, and places for the nests of the fowls of the air, and all the inhabitants of the earth fed upon its fruit. This represented the exceedingly prosperous condition of Nebuchadnezzar, the height of his exaltation, the extent of his dominions and renown, the splendour of his kingdom, the multitude of his subjects who received protection from him, and the peace and plenty which they enjoyed under his administration. (Marg. Ref.) He then saw a watcher and a holy One, either a holy angel, or a divine person, who was called a watcher, as watching over the affairs of men, (23, 24.) who spake with great authority and energy, and as one giving orders to his servants, to hew down the tree, &c: yet, when the branches, leaves, and fruit should be destroyed or scattered, and the beasts and fowls driven away, the stump of the tree was to be preserved in the earth, as if girt round with iron and brass, being overgrown with grass, and wet with the dew of heaven. Here a transition was made from the tree, to Nebuchadnezzar, who was represented by it; the tree being lost sight of, a person came in its stead; (as the imagination in dreams frequently passes from one thing to another, in a wild and incoherent manner.) This person was represented as living on the grass of the field, as wetted with the dew of heaven, as having his portion with the beasts; and as having lost the heart or disposition of a man; being estranged from the pursuits, employments, and manners

17 This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones: to the intent that the living may know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men.

18 This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen. Now thou, O Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation thereof, inasmuch as all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make known unto me the interpretation: but thou art able; for the Spirit of the holy Gods is in thee.

19 Then Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, was astonished for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him. The king spake, and said, Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies.

of life peculiar to the human species, and fitted to associate with the beasts of the field. Thus he would continue, till seven times or years passed over him; and then this condition would be terminated, and he restored to his former capacities and situation. All this would take place by the decree of the watchers, and by the demand of the holy Ones, which some understand of the holy angels, the ministers of Providence; who obtained from God this decree, and commission to carry it into execution, for the manifestation of the divine glory in abasing this proud man. Others by holy ones understand the saints of God, true believers, in answer to whose earnest prayers for deliverance from oppression, this decree was made. But some think that the "Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God of Hosts," the triune JEHOVAH, was meant by the watchers and the Holy Ones: and indeed Daniel's interpretation gives great sanction to this opinion: as he says that "this was the decree of the most High," (23, 24.) By his appointment this event would take place, and be notified to all that lived on the earth, that they might know, that the most High was the ruler in the kingdom of men; that he was above the mightiest monarchs, and disposed of them and their dominions as he pleased: and that he frequently placed over them the meanest and basest of men. This dream Nebuchadnezzar desired Daniel to interpret; as he, and he alone, could do it, by the inspiration of the Spirit of God.

V. 19. When Daniel had heard this dream, and perceived what a terrible calamity was coming on his prince and benefactor, for whom he had a benevolent regard; and when he considered the painful, and even perilous service imposed on him, of declaring this terrible message from God to a man of so impetuous and violent a temper; he was greatly astonished, and kept silence for an hour under perturbation of mind. This the king noticed, and bade him not be troubled at the dream, or its interpretation; intimating that he should not be offended at him, for declaring the heaviest tidings to him. Accordingly Daniel introduced the subject with a very courtly, yet doubtless sincere expression of his good will: had the matter rested with him, the dream and its interpretation would have concerned only his enemies; but the most high God had otherwise determined. 'He was troubled for the great judgment of God, which he saw ordained against the king; and so the prophets used, on the one part, to denounce God's judgments, for the zeal they bare to his glory; and on the other part, to have compassion upon man, and also to consider, that they should be subject to God's judgments, if they did not regard them with pity.'

One hour. The word hour, as measuring time, occurs first in the writings of this prophet. (iii. 15.)

V. 20-26. The application of the dream to Nebuchadnezzar was very obvious. He was the flourishing tree, which in various respects was emblematical of his power, fame, wealth, and prosperity. The hewing down also of this tree, with the circumstances attending it, showed his loss of these advantages, through that judgment of God that was coming upon him: for being smitten with a most extraordinary madness, and becoming for a time like a brute, he would be utterly incapable of all the functions of government; and being consequently set aside, others would assume the direction of public affairs: and no remedy being found for his malady, and he discovering in every thing the propensities of an animal, he would be driven from the dwellings of men, and left to associate with the beasts, feeding with them upon grass, and exposed without shelter or covering to the inclemencies of the weather. This would continue for seven times, or years; till at length he would be made to know, that the most High ruled in the kingdom of men, and gave it to whom he pleased. It is observable, that Daniel omitted the last expression used by the king; and setteth up over it the basest of men; thinking perhaps the application mortifying enough without repeating it. He also showed him, that the kingdom would be ensured to him, after he was convinced, that, however high any of the kings of the earth might be exalted, the heavens, or the God of heaven, alone ruled with independent and absolute authority. This dream and its interpretation would become known in the court of Nebuchadnezzar; and as Daniel was in great authority there, when the former part of it received so remarkable an accomplishment, he would use his influence to lead all parties concerned to expect the fulfilment of the latter part also: and thus God wonderfully inclined their hearts to wait for that event, managing the affairs of the empire by a regency, and not advancing any other person to the throne; that it might be open for Nebuchadnezzar's restoration, when he recovered the use of his rational powers.

V. 27. Daniel concluded by entreating the king to take in good part the counsel that he was about to give him; and in good earnest to repent and renounce his sins, and begin to lead a life of righteousness; to cease from all oppression and injustice, and show mercy to his poor subjects and captives, especially the poor worshippers of JEHOVAH: that so renouncing idolatry, he might become the servant of the most High God; for perhaps this might prove a lengthening of his tranquillity. Daniel could not be sure but that this judgment was conditionally denounced, (as the destruction of Nineveh by Jonah:) or it might at least be retarded, or alleviated. 'Wherefore, O king, 28 ¶ All this ¹ came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar.

29 At the ² end of twelve months, he walked ³ in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon.

30 The king spake and said, ¹ Is not this ² great Babylon, ³ that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, ⁴ and for the honour of my majesty ?

31 While ¹ the word was in the king's mouth, there ² fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken ; ³ The kingdom is departed from thee.

32 And ¹ they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field : they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, ² until thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

33 The ¹ same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

34 ¶ And ¹ at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar ² lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and ³ I blessed ⁴ the most High, and I praised and honoured ⁵ him that liveth for ever, ⁶ whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation :

¹ regard the counsel which I—give thee:—be thou careful to turn away from those sins wherewith thou hast provoked God, unto a holy and righteous carriage before him;—resolve now to demean thyself religiously towards God, and mercifully towards his afflicted people: and if there be any possible means to continue thy peace and welfare, this is it which I have now prescribed thee. (Pp. Hall) ² Cease from provoking God any longer by thy sins; that he may mitigate his punishment, if thou show by thy upright life, that thou hast true faith and repentance. ³ Let there be an healing of thy error. (Marg.) ⁴ Suffer the errors of thy former life to be redressed. ⁵ The Septuagint renders the first clause, Redeem thy iniquities by alms-deeds: but the translation no more accords to the original than the doctrine does to the constant tenour of Scripture.

V. 28—33. The Lord gave Nebuchadnezzar a year's respite and space for repentance: but he seems neither to have repented nor profited by Daniel's plain-dealing; and probably the impression wore off in a continual succession of business and pleasure. So that, after the expiration of the year, he was exceedingly elated in his mind by reflecting on his great success and achievements. He is generally supposed to have been walking in a terrace of those hanging gardens, that were annexed to his most magnificent palace: these were raised to a vast height in the air, with surprising art, labour, and expense; and from the uppermost he had a view at once of the whole city, and all its sumptuous edifices. With these objects before his eyes, he said, (probably in soliloquy,) "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built, &c.?" The city had indeed been founded many ages before: but he had vastly enlarged, beautified, enriched, replenished, and fortified it; so that it became the wonder of the world for its walls, temples, palaces, and decorations; and therefore he spake as if he had built it from the ground. The end he proposed in these works was, that it might be "the house of his kingdom;" his royal city, the centre of his kingdom, and the seat of his government: this he supposed he had done by his own power; and he aimed in doing it to promote the honour of his majesty. Thus he took all the glory to himself, and overlooked entirely his obligations and accountability to God, and his dependence on him: he regarded all as his own, to be used according to his own will, and for his own glory, without any respect to the will and glory of God. This was the language of a proud apostate rebel, of one who aspired to the throne of God and was his rival; according to the first temptation, "Ye shall be as gods;" and according to the character of the ambitious tempter, who aspires to be the god and prince of this world; (Marg. Ref.) But whilst this proud word was in the king's mouth, and probably known to none but God and himself; a voice came from heaven directed to him by name, and denouncing the immediate execution of the sentence predicted in the dream. These seem to have been the last words that he understood, before he was deprived of his reason; and they were attended with such terror, as might concur in bringing the judgment upon him: however, he well recollected them, when at length he recovered his senses. Immediately the sentence was carried into execution; and he continued brutalized, (so to speak,) till his hairs, (probably over his whole body,) were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws. It is of no use to inquire particularly into the nature and causes of this strange malady, or to show that aught of the kind ever befel any other person. Nothing is too hard for the Lord: it was immediately from him, in execution of his righteous sentence, for the display of his own glory, and for other most merciful purposes, though it had the appearance of severity. The previous notice, given by the dream and its interpretation, would tend to dispose the persons concerned to concur with the divine appointment, and to leave him for the time to the life of a brute.

V. 34—37. At the end of the predicted season, Nebuchadnezzar was suddenly restored to the perfect use of his reason. He lifted up his eyes to heaven, as a rational creature, and in adoration of the glorious majesty of God, who there reigned over all the kings of the earth; and, (instead of raging like a wild bull in a net, as so proud a man under so mortifying a dispensation would have been apt to do,) he blessed and praised the most high God; acknowledging the justice, wisdom, and mercy of his dealings with him; thanking him for sparing and recovering him; and giving him honour and worship, as the living and true God, the universal, almighty, and everlasting Sovereign; in comparison of whom all the inhabitants of the earth, even the mightiest monarchs and conquerors, are reputed as nothing; who doeth according to his own will both in the glorious armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and as none can withstand his power, or defeat his counsels; so none may find fault with any thing he doeth, or call him to account; seeing he hath an unalienable right to do what he will, and cannot deviate from the most perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. This acknowledgment was the first evidence that his reason was restored to him; and it showed that he was far more rational than he had ever been before; and more fit for ruling others, seeing he understood his subordination to God, as his Ruler and Lord. Accordingly he was reinstated in his honour and prosperity, that his kingdom might be rendered more glorious and renowned than ever: his counsellors and princes, (induced probably by Daniel,) perceiving the predicted change, sought to him, and replaced him on his throne; and he was more honoured and prospered than he had been before, as he probably ruled more in righteousness, and for the general good of his subjects. And now he declared to the whole world, that instead of seeking his own glory, or worshipping Belus, it was his business and constant practice to worship and honour the king of heaven; all whose works verify his holy word; all whose dealings with his creatures are in justice and wisdom, and who knows how to humble in repentance, or to abase in contempt and destruction, those who walk in pride, and have been most habituated to it or most odious in it. No better words could possibly have been spoken on the subject, nor can any comment reach their energy and full meaning: and though we cannot perhaps certainly conclude any man's conversion from his words, without we witness his works coincident with them: yet there can be no reasonable doubt, but he was a true penitent, a convert to God, and a believer. The simplicity and humility with which he recorded his own proud and vain-glorious language, and the diligence with which he circulated this mortifying narrative throughout his empire, concur with his excellent discourse of God and his works and his dealings with him, in establishing this conclusion. And the exceeding riches of God's mercy and grace in rendering such a proud tyrant, idolater, and oppressor, one of his children and servants, should not be veiled from our view. Nor does this instance materially differ from the case of other sinners, who have given evidence of their humiliation, repentance, faith, reconciliation to God, love to him, and zeal for his glory, even when connected with their own disgrace: for 'where sin hath abounded grace much more abounds.' 'Nebuchadnezzar exposes himself to shame before the whole world, that he may glorify God. This is the true way of praising God.' It is computed that Nebuchadnezzar did not live above a year after this restoration: and though the imperfect histories which remain of those times, give no distinct account of these events; yet they mention that he prophesied of the conquest of Babylon by the Medes and Persians, and of other remote transactions. This must have arisen from the attention that he paid, towards the close of his life, to the prophecies of Daniel, and the assurance with which he declared his expectation of their accomplishment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The dispassionate language of those who have most disturbed the earth by their ambition, implies that peace is the greatest of all blessings; and that they are the best friends to mankind, and the most honourable characters, who do most towards promoting and multiplying peace, temporal and spiritual, betwixt God and man, betwixt man and man, and in men's hearts and consciences.—When a sinner "comes to himself," whatever his previous character and conduct have been, he will deem it good to promote the welfare of mankind, by diffusing the knowledge of God, and of his glorious perfections and wonderful works; and if occasion require, he will be ready to declare the very things which most discover the sinfulness and folly of his own conduct, and the pride of his own heart. The more men get acquainted with God and his works, the higher their admiration will be of his greatness and glory; and the less they will think of their own attainments and exaltation: and we should all count it our privilege to propagate our discoveries on such interesting subjects according to our measure of ability, influence, or authority. When carnal men have accomplished their projects, and have arrived at the degree of prosperity and affluence to which they aspired; when they are at rest in their houses or palaces, and flourishing in their external circumstances; when they are saying to their souls, in vain-confident security, "Soul take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry:" then there is reason to conclude, that some heavy calamity impends over them. If at any time terror seizes on ungodly men, they generally first seek direction, or relief, from sinful measures or worthless delusions: nor do any of us at all times apply to the Lord, or his servants, for counsel or comfort, till other counselors and comforters disappoint our expectations. The more these are proved, the emptier they are found to be, and the plainer it appears, that they promise only to deceive. But it is happy, if at last we are willing humbly to hearken to those, who are taught by the Spirit of our holy God, to make known to us his truth and will. Yet many have general convictions, as well as repeated instructions, concerning the divine perfections, authority, and majesty; and concerning a discrimination of characters between the faithful ministers of Christ and deceivers of every kind; whose views remain strangely confused, whose hearts still cleave to their idols, superstitions, and lusts; and who only apply for information in their perplexity, without any disposition to yield an obedient ear to the commandments of God.

V. 10—13.

The utmost worldly prosperity and exaltation, is but as that of a tree growing out of the earth, to a great height, very conspicuous, covered with leaves and branches, and such fruit as may profit men in their temporal interests; and which must soon be cut down, destroyed, or cast into the fire: but the "trees of righteousness," which the Lord hath planted, when they cease to flourish and bear fruit on earth, shall be transplanted to heaven, and be fruitful and flourishing there for ever. Monarchs should use their power to protect and diffuse good among their subjects; but how feeble is their protection, and how trivial their good, compared with that of Christ our Prince and Saviour! The degree and continuance of human prosperity depend entirely on that glorious Lord, who "orders all things according to the counsel of his own will," for the honour of his great name; often by the ministration of angels, and in answer to the prayers and for the good of his people. He mercifully corrects, when he might justly destroy; and the most severe and durable of all temporal calamities is unspeakable mercy to a sinner, if it conduce to the salvation of his soul. And though every kind and degree of insanity be justly dreaded, as the most terrible affliction to which we are here exposed: yet should the most entire madness, idiotism, or even degradation to the rank of the brutes, for years, preserve a sinner from multiplying crimes, and treasuring up wrath; there would be in it a degree of mercy, and it would evidently be preferable to an unrestrained course of prosperous vice: and if at last it should be over-ruled to his salvation, it would be the subject of eternal praises. Nay, if the Lord should see good by such means to keep a believer from dishonouring his name, by any folly or wickedness to which he was powerfully tempted; the dreadful prevention would be far preferable to the evil thus prevented. So that we know: of what is best for us, all things considered. No honour, dignity, wealth, abilities, learning, or usefulness, can ensure a man from the most degrading situation, in which human nature hath yet been placed: and it would be easy for the Lord to reduce any person to the extremest indigence and misery, that ever were experienced in a hospital, a dungeon, or a mad-house; or even to drive him forth among the beasts of the field, to feed and herd with them, and grow like them. We should therefore be thankful for, and make a good use of, our reason and advantages, whilst we enjoy them; and we should diligently seek the assurance of those blessings, that can never be taken from us: we should especially beware of pride and forgetfulness of God, and study to be influenced by the conviction, that the most High ruleth over the whole world, and giveth it to whom he pleaseth: and we have no reason to covet or glory in those outward distinctions, which are often conferred on the basest of men, but we ought rather to seek those blessings, that are peculiar to the saints, who are the excellent of the earth.

V. 19—27.

It may well astonish and trouble a benevolent mind, to reflect on the miseries, which impend over ungodly men; and even over many of those, with whom we are most nearly connected, and to whom we are under the greatest obligations. We should, as opportunity offers, be faithful to the greatest of men; yet recollection and caution should precede our addresses, as they must give pain or offence; and they should be delivered with such expressions of goodwill, as may evince, that we are grieved to speak what we dare not conceal, and would gladly avert what we cannot but perceive to be coming upon them. They who are in superior stations should encourage the servants of God to deal plainly with them, as they will be much tempted to the contrary, which would be the loss of both parties.—A great part of the minister's faithfulness consists in applying general truths to particular persons or characters; that every sinner may discern himself to be intended, and not others only as his self-love may suggest. This should be so clearly stated, that men may see how the case and character described in the word of God agree with their own; and how the doom denounced belongs to them, except they repent: for the decree of the most high God will be executed upon kings, as well as upon their meanest subjects. It may be doubtful, whether temporal calamities can by any means be averted; but final misery will certainly be escaped by all who ^a repent and turn to God, ^b and do works meet for repentance. And if it be ^c the Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom, it will be made sure to us, as with a hand of iron and brass; all our trials and losses will work together to prepare us for it, and put us in possession of it; and to bring us to that knowledge of God, that submission to his righteousness, teaching, and authority, and that humble love of his name and zeal for his glory, which constitute the meekness for that inheritance. It behoves those, who declare God's judgments against sinners, to call them to repentance; and to show them what they must cease from, and do; what they ought to renounce, and what to choose: for there can be no true faith or forgiveness, where men do not break off their sins by righteousness, and learn justice, equity, and mercy to the poor and afflicted. These things duly attended to may lengthen our temporal tranquillity; and if they spring from an upright heart, they will evidence our interest in heavenly blessings.

V. 23—37.

When the Lord gives time for repentance as well as warnings, and calls to repent, and men grow hardened in pride; when they persist and increase in self-sufficiency and self-idolatry; in contempt of God, and his authority, justice and mercy; and in sacrilegiously robbing him of his glory: the sentence that hath been long suspended over them, must be executed suddenly and without remedy.—The voice of his condemning word will silence all the proud speeches, which sinners are uttering to themselves, or to one another. Whatever dreadful misery, or place men fall into on earth, they will on ^a way or other get out again: but they, who lift up their eyes in hell, will never be able to pass that gulph which separates betwixt them and the heirs of salvation. The Lord can increase, extend, limit, and terminate our troubles, as he pleases: and as he can deprive men of, or restore them to, the use of their understandings, and disqualify or again fit them for, every place and service; as he can renew, humble, and soften the heart, and bring the proud enemy to become his most devoted supplicant and thankful worshipper and servant: so he can restrain the ambition of men, and lead those who know him not to fulfil his purposes; even where that requires such an exactness in their conduct, as seems only capable of being produced by the most conscientious, unreserved, and self-denying obedience. When sinners recover from that state of infatuation, to which they are reduced by Satan and their lusts, and through which they pore and grovel upon the earth, like the beasts that perish; they will first show it, by lifting up their eyes to heaven, adoring, and expecting help from God, and setting their affections on things above: and when believers are delivered from sanctified affliction, instead of repining at the Lord's dealings with them, they will, with their restored health and faculties, bless the most high God for his gracious chastisement, as well as for the removal of it; and endeavour to honour him who liveth and reigneth for evermore. In proportion to our near and distinct views of his holy and righteous sovereignty and almighty power, the meaner will all the inhabitants of the earth appear in our estimation; for they are reputed as nothing before him. As ^a he doeth what ^b he will in heaven and on earth, and none can stay ^c his hand, or call him to account for his conduct; we should learn to receive every thing as his appointment, to submit to his will, to seek his favour, and to rejoice that his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. Thus our trials and deliverances will prove mercies; and we shall use every gift of God to promote the glory of the giver. This is our highest privilege, and the sure path to immortal happiness; wherein ^d excellent majesty will be ^e added to us. In every circumstance of life and death, we should bless, praise, and honour our God and Saviour, and excite others to do the same; for ^f all his works are ^g done in truth, and his ways are judgment: ^h he knoweth how to abase those who walk in pride, but he giveth grace and consolation to the humble and broken-hearted sinner, that calls upon him.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. Belshazzar signifies Bel is his riches: he was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and not his immediate successor, (Note, Ezra i. 1—4.) (Marg. Ref.) He reigned seventeen years; and was all that while engaged in unsuccessful war with Cyrus and the Medes and Persians, having succeeded to it along with his kingdom. Cyrus had driven the Chaldean armies out of the field, and at this time besieged Babylon: but the king and people, confiding in their impregnable fortifications, the abundance of provisions stored up in the city, and the extent of cultivated lands within the walls, derided his attempts. Indeed it seemed scarcely possible that he should succeed: but he was raised up by God for that service, and was ended with extraordinary capacity, vigour, and perseverance; whilst Belshazzar was a feeble and negligent prince, given up to pleasure, and leaving the affairs of his kingdom to others. Cyrus had already formed his plan, and had privately made preparation for draining off the waters of the Euphrates into adjacent lakes and reservoirs; that he might march his army on its channel into the city; and he waited for this feast, as the proper time for the execution of his design. It was a stated festival, probably observed in honour of some idol, on which it was customary for the people of all ranks to give a full loose to their appetites, in every kind of indulgence: and Cyrus reasonably expected on that occasion to find them off their guard and in the utmost confusion; nor was he disappointed. For, regardless of so potent and vigilant an enemy at the gates, Belshazzar set his subjects the example of riot and excess, and they copied it. He entertained a thousand of his nobles at his own table, and it was considered as a great condescension that he would eat and drink with them; for these princes did not generally mix with their subjects. Whilst they were thus regaling themselves with generous wines, he purposed to fetch the sacred vessels of the temple to drink out of, in contempt of JEHOVAH and his worshippers. The seventy predicted years of the captivity, from Jehoiakim's first reduction, drew near to an end; and Belshazzar might intend this to show his disregard of the prophecies respecting the restoration of the Jews. The vessels seem hitherto to have remained unmolested in the treasury of the temple of Belus: some indeed think, that they had been dedicated to that idol, and used in his worship; but this does not appear from the history. Belshazzar, however, at this time determined to appropriate them to his own use, and to pollute them by idolatry and intemperance. For whilst the company drank out of these sacred vessels, they celebrated the praises of their images, which were mere lifeless gold, or silver, &c.; probably singing songs of their pretended exploits, and to their honour; pouring out libations to them; and ascribing all the victories of their ancestors and the greatness of their city, to their assistance; especially praising them as the authors of their success against the worshippers of JEHOVAH. Thus they seemed ambitious of carrying impiety and blasphemy to the greatest extreme. Many expositors seem to consider sacrilege as almost exclusively Belshazzar's crime.

But the spoiling of the sacred treasures by Nebuchadnezzar, and no doubt appropriating them to his own use, was sacrilege in the same sense, as Belshazzar's employing the sacred vessels to common purposes: and the peculiar heinousness of Belshazzar's sin, seems to have consisted, in studiously and publicly insulting the God of Israel, by using the sacred vessels of his temple, when feasting in honour of the idols of Babylon.

V. 5—9. Whilst the king, his nobles, and women, were rejoicing with impious mirth, in defiance of the power, providence, and word of God; there appeared on the wall of the room, the fingers of a man's hand, employed in writing, over against the candlestick, that it might be more distinctly seen. This no doubt was effected by the ministration of an angel: as the king first saw the hand, so the writing afterwards remained on the wall; and though he did not understand what was written, yet conscious guilt led him to forebode some dreadful meaning.
His thoughts troubled him; his remorse of conscience caused him to turn pale; his whole frame was disordered, so that the joints of his loins were loosed through terror, and his knees smote against each other; (Notes, Is. xxi.
2—5. xlv. 1—3. Marg. Ref.) in great anguish and agitation therefore, he called to his servants to bring in the astrologers, &c.: and with large promises of honour and preferment, he allured them to exert their utmost skill to read and interpret the hand writing. But they were not able to do it; and some not very probable conjectures have been formed concerning the reason of their inability: but we only know, that God was pleased, for the honour of his own name, to hide it from them. This renewed, or increased, Belshazzar's consternation; and his nobles also, notwithstanding their numbers, mirth, and wine, were dismayed and astonished exceedingly. 'It was probably ' written in the old Hebrew letters, now called the Samaritan, which the Chaldeans were ignorant of.' (Lowth.)
—It is, however, hardly conceivable, that no learned man in Babylon should be acquainted with the old Hebrew alphabet. But perhaps the difficulty lay, not in knowing the characters, but in finding out any consistent meaning in them. (Note, 25—26.)

not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed.

11 There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the Spirit of the holy Gods; and in the days of thy father light and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him; whom the king Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the king, Isay, thy father, made master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers;

12 Forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts were found in the same Daniel, whom the king named Belshazzar: now let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation.

13 Then was Daniel brought in before the king. And the king spake and said unto Daniel, Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of Judah, whom the king my father brought out of a Jewry?

14 I have even heard of thee, that the Spirit of the gods is in thee, and that light and understanding and excellent wisdom is found in thee.

15 And now the wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read this writing, and make known unto me the interpretation thereof: but they could not shew the interpretation of the thing:

16 And I have heard of thee, that thou canst make interpretations, and dissolve doubts: now if thou canst read the writing, and make known to me the interpretation thereof, thou shalt be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about thy neck, and shalt be the third ruler in the kingdom.

17 Then Daniel answered and said before the king, Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; yet I will read the writing unto the king, and make known to him the interpretation.

V. 10—12. The queen, here spoken of, was not the queen-consort, as Belshazzar's wives and concubines were present at the feast; but the queen-mother, Nitocris, the widow of Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar and the father of Belshazzar, is generally supposed to be meant. She was a woman of great capacity and reputation; and her active and prudent management had been for some time the chief stay of the empire. She had not attended this riotous banquet: but hearing the tidings of the hand-writing, she came into the room: and, after the customary salutation, exhorted the king to resume his courage, and not to yield to terror or despondency: for though the wise men of Babylon could not read the writing, he had a man in his kingdom who could. She spoke of Daniel in language similar to what Nebuchadnezzar had used, and which she probably had learned from him; for she was aged, and Nebuchadnezzar had not been dead above twenty-four years, so that she no doubt well remembered the extraordinary events which occurred towards the close of his life. Having mentioned, that "in him was the Spirit of the holy Gods," she spake with admiration of the variety of knowledge and wisdom that he possessed, like those of the gods, (according to her confused ideas on that subject:); she mentioned his being advanced above all the other wise men of Babylon; as having been repeatedly proved superior to them in excellency of knowledge and disposition, and in interpreting dreams, or solving difficult questions; alluding no doubt to the instances that have been considered. (ii. iv.) And she observed that if he were called, he would certainly read and interpret the hand-writing. Probably, she knew where to find him, though Belshazzar did not; and might tacitly intend to censure his neglect of so extraordinary a person. Though Nebuchadnezzar called Daniel Belshazzar, from the name of his idol, he was it seems generally known by his original name. He was not among the magicians, &c. when called by Belshazzar: and both these circumstances show, that he was well known as a zealous worshipper of Israel's God, and as entirely estranged from the practices of the magicians; though erroneously considered by Nitocris as the master of them. (Note, iv. 3, 9.)

V. 13—16. Some infer from Belshazzar's ignorance of Daniel, that he had not been employed by him; but this rather proves that the king minded pleasure more than business; and was better acquainted with those who ministered to his sensuality, than with such as managed affairs of state. It is certain that Daniel did "the king's business" in the former years of Belshazzar. (viii. 27, and it seems probable, that he was never quite laid aside, though comparatively neglected. Indeed Belshazzar spoke to him with less respect, than Nebuchadnezzar had been used to do; and seems even to have reflected on him as a stranger and a captive, whilst he acknowledged his extraordinary endowments. As, however, the wise men could not read the writing, and he had been informed that Daniel could, he was willing that he should on that condition have the promised recompense.

V. 17. Daniel evidently behaved in a very different manner to Belshazzar, on this occasion, from what he had formerly done to Nebuchadnezzar; both omitting the customary expressions of respect and good-will, and slighting his offers of honour and preferment. But it should be considered, that Nebuchadnezzar was his senior, as well as his superior in authority, and his benefactor: whereas he spoke to Belshazzar as a very aged and eminent person, (being at this time almost ninety years old,) to one much younger than himself. He had in former instances known from prophecy, that the Chaldean monarchy would continue for some time, and his preference gave him an opportunity of being useful; but he was now assured that Belshazzar's reign and life, and the Chaldean monarchy, were about to terminate together. Probably he was at this time nearly, if not fully, as high in authority as Belshazzar proffered to advance him; and he could scarcely avoid despising one that was so extremely ignorant concerning the affairs of his own kingdom. Nebuchadnezzar was a very faulty character: yet he had abilities, applied them to business, and was in many respects eminent, as a monarch; but Belshazzar was every way base, odious, and contemptible. Above all, he had that night been insulting the God of heaven in the most daring manner, by profaning the sacred vessels in his revels, and extolling his own idols. Daniel therefore knew that his doom was irreversible, and immediately to be put in execution: and he did not speak to him, as a subject to his prince; but as the delegate of heaven he denounced sentence against him, as a condemned criminal.

V. 18-24. Daniel called the king's attention to the singular example of Nebuchadnezzar, (whom he calls his father, as grandfathers, and even more remote ancestors, are often called in Scripture, (Harg. Ref.) and thus solemnly introduced his interpretation. Nebuchadnezzar had received all his power from God; he had become terrible to all the nations of his vast empire; and he had used his unlimited authority, not always with equity and clemency, but often in an arbitrary and unjust manner. Yet the immediate cause of that well-known judgment, to which he was exposed, was the hardness of his heart, through pride and presumption, in arrogant contempt and defiance of God: for which diabolical sin he was degraded as it were to a brute, till he was brought to submit and worship the Lord; which at length he did in language almost angelical. (Notes, iv.) But though Belshazzar had been fully informed of all these facts, yet he had not humbled himself before God; but had been guilty of an insult on him, more flagrant than any of Nebuchadnezzar's crimes; having sacrilegiously used the consecrated vessels in honour of his base idols, and thus refused to glorify the God, "in whose hand his breath was, and whose were all his ways." (Harg. Ref.) And it was at the very time, when he was thus setting JEHOVAH at defiance, that the hand-writing was seen on the wall.

V. 25-28. The literal meaning of the words written seems to be: "He hath numbered, He hath numbered; He hath weighed, and they divide it." This Daniel interpreted to signify, that God had certainly numbered the years or days of the Chaldean monarchy, and of Belshazzar's life, and they were now fully accomplished: the measure of his days was finished, and that of his iniquity was filled; so that God would no more spare him. Tekei. He hath weighed; this signified that the king was weighed in the impartial balances of divine justice, and found deserving of the deepest condemnation: as base metal and counterfeit money are detected by the scales, being weighed and found deficient.—Peres is the same as Upharsin, without the prefix and the termination, and signifies "they divide it;" but the similarity between Peres, and the original word for Persians, seems also referred to; and it was therefore interpreted to mean, that his kingdom was taken from him and given to the Medes, 29 Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom.

and Persians, who would possess it between them. It is remarkable, that Daniel never exhorted Belshazzar to repentance, for he knew that his doom was fixed, (Note, 1 Sam. xxviii. 12—19.)

V. 29. Belshazzar seems not to have understood that the sentence was to be executed immediately: but whether he believed Daniel or not, he made a point of showing no resentment, and of ordering him the promised recompense: and though Daniel had previously expressed his contempt of the honours intended him, yet he did not refuse them: though he foresaw the immediate termination of that authority by which they were conferred. Some, however, suppose, that the orders were indeed given immediately: but the execution of them was necessarily deferred till morning, which the intervening transactions of course prevented.

V. 30, 31. Whilst these things were transacting in the palace, two divisions of Cyrus's army had marched on the channel of the river into the city, from each end of it: and finding the gates of brass, intended to bar the entrance from the river into the streets, left open, through the carelessness and intoxication of the besieged, they met, and marched into the heart of the city without opposition, and surprised the palace before the alarm was given. So that, having broken in and slain Belshazzar, and proclaimed peace and safety to all who laid down their arms, a general submission followed, and the city was taken, and the empire reduced, almost without further blood-shed. (Marg. Ref.) Cyrus was son-in-law and nephew to Darius, or Cvaxares, the Mede; to whom the title of king and the civil authority belonged till his death, which happened about two years after: but Cyrus still retained the command of the army, and great power over the whole empire. It is computed, that Darius was born that very year in which Jeconiah was carried captive to Babylon, and a fatal blow given to the kingdom of Judah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Carnal men are often most secure, and given up to excessive indulgence, when destruction impends over their heads. Ostentation and studied magnificence unite with sensuality in stupifying their consciences and hardening their hearts: and if we could see how soon such joyous and luxurious revels are exchanged for "weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth;" we must view those who frequent them with a mixture of pity and aversion; as we should a company of condemned malefactors, whom we saw intoxicated, and dancing in their chains, immediately before the hour appointed for their execution. Such drunken carousals were very consistent in the worshippers of lifeless images and of unclean spirits: for it might have been expected, that these objects and ordinances of religious worship would lead men to impious and blasphemous defiance of the God of heaven; as well as into every excess in sensual gratification. But what have Christians to do with such revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries? And what better are the songs used in many modern feasts, extolling intemperate indulgencies and licentious amours, than the praises formerly sung to Bacchus, and Venus, or any other of the filthy group of Pagan Deities? Or what are these things but a direct insult on that triune God, in whose name we have been baptized? Yet many "think it strange, that we will not run with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of us!" Nay, some seem to imagine that no pleasures have their highest relish, unless seasoned with impiety or sacrilege; and they not only sin for the gratification of their sensual passions, but for the sake of sinning; as if their oaths, blasphemies, and profaneness, were pleasant to them, in proportion as they are provoking to God! and the more join together in such outrages, the bolder they grow in them. But how easily can the Lord dismay such daring enemies! He has no need to commission thunders, lightnings, or earthquakes: he can do it effectually by a handwriting on a wall, or by showing them what he hath written in his word. One glimpse of his glorious and holy majesty, one realizing apprehension of "his wrath revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," is sufficient to appal the heart, to change the countenance, and to agitate the whole frame, of the stoutest rebel on earth. But no bodily pain or anguish can give an adequate conception of that inward agony, which sometimes seizes the sinner, in the midst of mirth and jovial company, when enjoying all the delights of sense, with all the magnificence of a palace, or the exhilarations of a banqueting-house. For if God is pleased merely to let a man's conscience loose upon him, his own thoughts will so trouble him, that his feelings will be an anticipation of the sorrows of death and of the pains of hell. How important then is it, that we, above all things, seek to be at peace with him, and with our own consciences! Sometimes indeed such terrors are salutary, and cause a man to cry out, "What must I do to be saved?" and so lead him to Christ for pardon and peace. But many cry out, through horror of conscience and fear of wrath, who are not humbled for their sins, and who seek relief from anguish by lying vanities. These will liberally reward such as can help them to forget their misery, or amuse them with vain hopes, or gratify their curiosity, pride, or sensuality.—But when the Lord lays his hand on men, these expedients do not afford so much as a temporary relief: and he often blinds and infatuates the wise men of this world, that he may bring into notice those whom he hath endued with heavenly wisdom; nor can all human sagacity develop the plainest matter that he is pleased to conceal. Yet the ignorance and uncertainty, which professedly wise men manifest concerning the meaning of sacred Scripture, tends to drive awakened sinners to despair.

CHAP. VI.

Daniel is highly preferred by Darius, and envied by his courtiers, who can find no occasion against him except concerning his religion, 1—5. Darius is prevailed on to sign a decree prohibiting every one, during thirty days, to present any petition to either God or man except the king, under pain of being cast into the den of lions, 6—9. Daniel prays three times a day to the Lord as usual; is accused before Darius; the execution of the sentence is urgently demanded, and Daniel is cast into the den of lions, 10—17.

V. 10—17.

In this evil world the most excellent and useful persons are often left in obscurity, like diamonds in the rubbish of the quarry, because their value is not perceived: yet, if the Lord have work for them, he will, by one means or other, bring them forth to do it. The encouragement given, by persons in other respects of great abilities, to ungodly sinners, not to let their thoughts trouble them, often goes upon as erroneous principles as those on which the queen comforted Belshazzar. Alas! what did it avail him, that Daniel could read the writing, when it contained his irrevocable condemnation? And what else can the holy law do for transgressors, when men are taught to seek righteousness and salvation by their own obedience? Many have heard of, and been led to admire and applaud, the light understanding, and wisdom of some eminent servant of God; to ascribe his attainments to a divine influence, and to consider him as of a more excellent spirit than other men; who yet wish to consult him, only as a superior kind of magician, to interpret their dreams, to solve curious questions, and to explain difficult and controverted subjects, without inquiring after the way of salvation, or the path of duty! But if any one hath, even by such means, access to the great and powerful, when under tribulations or convictions, at whatever distance he may be kept, or however they may soothe him by promises or flatteries, he must remember his own character and work, and not be content with gratifying the humour of princes or nobles, or his own love of lucre or honour. In some cases it is right to reject their proffered kindness with decision, or even disdain; at all times to show an indifference about such matters, and be far more earnest to do them good, and declare the whole counsel of God.

V. 18—31.

When sinners have long neglected to profit by the judgments of God on others, their own aggravated destruction may be supposed to approach. Their ancestors, or neighbours, have prospered and forgotten their Maker; they have been intoxicated with exaltation, and have abused it in tyranny and oppression; they have become terrible in proportion as they have been powerful; and they have been hardened in proud contempt of God, instead of being rendered thankful to him. Perhaps he hath made examples of them in the view of others, by some signal judgments, till they have learned to submit and to adore: yet the persons who have known all this, have in similar circumstances imitated and exceeded their pride, tyranny, and impieties; regardless of that God “in whom they live, and move, and are!” Thus men fill up the measure of their iniquity, and bring upon themselves “the judgment that is written.” Whatever be their rank or situation, persons of this description cannot reasonably expect to hear any thing, except severe rebukes and awful denunciations, from the servants of God. Soon will every impenitent sinner find the hand-writing of God’s word, that now stands out against him, executed upon him; whether he be weighed in the balance of the law, as a self-righteous Pharisee, or in that of the Gospel, as a painted hypocrite. His days will soon be numbered and finished: he will be judged and condemned, and all that he seems to have will be taken from him, and divided among his enemies, or successors; whilst nothing will remain for himself but indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, for evermore. Ere the uncertain term of life then be finished, let us judge ourselves according to the word of God; let us weigh our characters in his impartial balances: that though the law condemn us as sinners, yet we may not be adjudged unbelievers by the Gospel, but may find an interest in those blessings, which will be perfected in a kingdom that cannot be moved, or taken from us. Having these good things, we may despise the honour that cometh from man; and we shall rejoice and be exalted, whilst sudden and inevitable destruction overtake all the workers of iniquity.

translated "that the king should have no damage," may be rendered, "that the king should not be troubled."

V. 3. We may suppose that Daniel's interpretation of the hand-writing, just before the taking of Babylon, made him known to Darius. His renown, however, for wisdom and integrity was very great, and he was found upon trial to deserve all the reputation which he had acquired; so that Darius, when he made a new arrangement of his dominions, upon this vast accession of territory, under three presidents, thought good to make Daniel the chief of them, and as it were the viceroy of the whole empire.

V. 4, 5. The great reputation and preferment of a stranger, who had also been a minister of state for many years under the kings of Babylon, could not but give umbrage to Darius's own subjects. The nobles of his court, especially the princes and presidents, would envy his prosperity, disdain subjection to him, and covet his high station, as well as hate him for his religion; and probably his circumspection, integrity, experience, and penetration, would preclude many of the courtiers from those fraudulent advantages, which they had expected, and would tend to expose their iniquitous practices. Thus various passions would concur in producing a combination against him. But such was his unexceptionable conduct, such his unbiassed impartiality, his strict integrity, and consummate prudence, that they could find no handle against him, or discover so much as a fault, or mistake, of which to accuse him before the king. And they were constrained to confess to each other, in their secret cabals, that they should never be able to substantiate an accusation against him, except they could render his religion criminal: and in this they knew him to be very exact, and one who would not deviate from his plan for any interest, or to avoid any danger.

V. 6-9. We can scarcely imagine a more absurd decree, than this proposed to Darius, to be by him rendered irreversible. And at first sight, it seems almost inconceivable that any man could be induced, by influence and persuasion, and without the shadow of an argument, to pass such an edict. But power and prosperity are intoxicating; this decree seemed to make the king, for a month, the sole deity and benefactor in his empire; and thus it addressed itself to his pride and vanity. His nobles would doubtless pretend, that it was thought a proper honour to be conferred on so illustrious a prince, and that it would conduce to the public tranquillity. At the instance therefore of so many chief men, perhaps deeming it a sort of a compliment; and having but faint impressions of a Supreme Being, to whom all have constant need to present their petitions, he heedlessly signed the decree, without suspecting the malice concealed under it. They pretended, that all the presidents were consulted, and concurred in proposing this matter to him: but Daniel the chief of them knew nothing of it; and so all signified no more than two of them! Probably the rest of the persons mentioned had yielded assent to it, some heedlessly, others maliciously. Thus, not only was all the exercise of every kind of religion suspended by law, through this vast empire, for the space of a month; (except any chose to worship the king, who thus inconsiderately, or impiously, suffered himself to be regarded as the only deity of his subjects;) but no request might be made by one man to another: nay, the edict was so framed, that a child might have been condemned by it for asking bread of his father, or a starving beggar for craving relief. But they who framed the law had one object in view, and did not mean to make any further use of it. We have consulted, which way we may do thee the most honour, and most ingratiate thee with thy subjects, now at thy first entrance on thy throne; and we have found no way more plausible than this; we have decreed, that none of thy subjects shall for the space of thirty days, make any petition, to any god or man, save to thee, O king: that by this means they may be insured to an awful and divine conceit of thy greatness, and be more encouraged to have access to thee, for the more endearing of thee to them by the granting of their suits. (Is. vi. 1.)

10 ¶ Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.

11 Then these men assembled, and found Daniel praying, and making supplication before his God.

12 Then they came near, and spake before the king concerning the king's decree; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any God or man within thirty days, save of thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not.

13 Then answered they and said before the king, That Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah, regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a day.

14 Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him; and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him.

15 Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed.

16 Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee.

17 And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords: that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel.

.. Persian at that time." (Louth.) (Notes, Esth. ii. 1. viii. 8.)

V. 10, 11. Daniel was either absent from court when this business was transacted, or it was studiously concealed from him; for he seems not to have heard of it, till it was signed by the king and made public. But when he knew what had been done, he did not complain to Darius of hard usage, or exclaim against the absurdity, impiety, and iniquity of the edict; or make interest to have it repealed, or get a dispensation in his favour. He knew that he was aimed at, and his people through him; and therefore, as a public and eminent person, he determined to set a decided example of his religion, without fearing what man could do to him. He thought himself called on to protest against the law in this manner, either disregarding his life in so good a cause, or expecting a miraculous deliverance. He therefore continued his stated devotions in his chamber, morning, noon, and evening, with his windows open, and probably his door also; for his accusers entered without interruption, and found him presenting his supplications to his God. Though the city and temple were desolated, yet he prayed towards Jerusalem, as it was customary, with reference to the temple that had been a type of Christ; though he was very old, yet he prayed upon his knees. Whatever he had done at other times, or whatever other Jews might do in this emergency, he would by no means conceal his religion; and though he was a man of much business, it appears that he had three stated seasons of devotion every day. It is generally supposed, that in this he had reference to the hours of prayer, which were commonly observed by the Jews. He would not by silence show that he consented to this wicked decree. He set open his windows towards Jerusalem when he prayed;

‘ both to stir up himself with the remembrance of God’s promises to his people, when they should pray toward that temple; and also that others might see, that he would neither consent in heart nor deed, for these few days, to any thing that was contrary to God’s glory.’

V. 12-17. When Daniel’s enemies had obtained the decree against him, and undeniable evidence of his disobedience to it, they seem still to have doubted of success; being aware how much the king valued so able and upright a servant, and how evidently he would perceive their malice in this machination against him. They therefore first reminded him that he had passed such a decree; seeking to draw from him an acknowledgment, that it was irreversible by the law of the Medes and Persians. Having succeeded in this, they copied the example of those who accused Shadrach, &c. before Nebuchadnezzar: and instead of mentioning Daniel as a man of great dignity, wisdom, and excellency; they described him contemptuously, as that Daniel, the captive Jew, who had been favoured and preferred; they accused him of disregarding the king and his decree, as if his worship of God had resulted from pride, ingratitude, and rebellion against Darius; and they reported that he made his petition three times a day, so that his offences were multiplied; but they did not mention the Object of his worship, perhaps lest that should suggest a vindication of his conduct. The king, however, at once perceived for what purpose the decree had been solicited; and was exceedingly displeased with himself, that he had suffered himself to be so deluded; as, under pretence of honouring him above all that was called god, or worshipped, they had devised to render him accessory to the murder of the most eminent and excellent person in his dominions. Under this conviction, he was very earnest to 18 ¶ Then the king went to his palace, and passed the night fasting: neither were * instruments of music brought before him: ^b and his sleep went from him.

19 Then the king ^c arose very early in the morning, and went in haste unto the den of lions.

20 And when he came to the den, he cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel: and the king spake and said to Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, ^a is thy God, whom thou ^b servest continually, ^c able to deliver thee from the lions?

21 Then said Daniel unto the king, O king, live for ever.

23 Then ^a was the king exceeding glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, ^b because he believed in his God.

24 And the king commanded, ^a and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den of lions, them, ^b their children, and their wives: and ^c the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces, or ever they came at the bottom of the den.

delivered Daniel; and he spent the day in considering how it might be done, and in trying to effect it; either by evading or dispensing with the edict, or in persuading his nobles not to insist on the execution of it. But the foolish constitution of this government, (exactly the reverse of the happy rule for our monarch's conduct!) allowed indeed their kings to be as tyrannical and mischievous as they pleased; but tied them up from pardoning any person, who had broken one of their decrees, however capricious and arbitrary! They might be cruel and unjust; but in many cases they might not be merciful, and in some they were restrained from doing justice! Thus the ringleaders of this faction turbulently assembled before Darius, and as it were demanded the execution of this most iniquitous sentence, as their constitutional right; so that Daniel was at length given up to their implacable rage. In this Darius was greatly to blame; for he should have refused his consent to so palpable an act of injustice, whatever had been the consequence. He however entertained some expectations, that Daniel's God, whom he had worshipped so long and devotedly, would rescue him in this emergency; having probably heard of the preservation of the three pious Jews in the fiery furnace. Thus he allowed, that Daniel had done right, and had pleased God, in violating his decree, and in that very action, for which he consented to cast him into the den of lions: as Pilate afterwards justified Christ, when he delivered him to be crucified.— Daniel was therefore thrown into the den of lions; and it might have been expected that they would have devoured him at once. Yet either it was seen, that the lions did not seize on him; or some expectation of a miraculous interposition, induced them to close the den with a stone, sealed with the king's own signet and that of his lords; that there might be full security against all collusion, and that he might be confined all night among the lions. (Hurg. Ref.)

V. 18—23. No doubt Daniel spent a far more pleasant night among the lions, whilst employed in fervent prayer and admiring grateful praise, than either the king, or his malicious prosecutors. As for the former, he was so grieved, and ashamed of his folly, so affected with the consideration of having cast his faithful servant into the den of lions, and so anxious about the event, that he spent the night fasting, and without any of his ordinary recreations, nor could he close his eyes to sleep. And as soon as the morning allowed him, he repaired to the den, having yet some hope that Daniel had been miraculously preserved. The decree having been now complied with, we may suppose that he ordered the stone to be removed; and then, through fear and consciousness of misconduct, he dolefully ventured to speak to Daniel, as if yet alive; inquiring whether the living God, whom he served continually, had shown himself able to deliver him. Some indeed think that he saw Daniel before he spake, but the contrary seems more probable: and his expectation of a miracle shows, that he had strong convictions of the power of Israel's God, though worldly motives retained him among the worshippers of idols. To this inquiry, Daniel, being safe and easy both in body and mind, answered with the utmost composure, without any complaint of unkindness, but with a respectful expression of his good will. Not only was the God of Israel able to protect him from the lions; but even a single angel, when commissioned by him, had power effectually to shut all their mouths. In this manner God had seen good to attest his innocency, in that matter for which he had been condemned: seeing, that he had approved himself upright before his heart-searching Judge; and he could appeal to the king also, that he had done him no wrong; having been actuated by a sense of duty, and not by any contempt of him or his laws. This answer was very welcome to Darius, who now ordered Daniel to be taken up out of the den: and he was found entirely unhurt; because he had believed in his God, and trusted in his protection whilst he obeyed his commandments.

V. 24. The law of the Medes and Persians forbade the king to pardon Daniel; but it did not restrain him from casting his accusers into the lion's den in his stead: nay, perhaps malicious prosecutors and false accusers were legally exposed to the same sentence that they sought to bring upon the innocent; for this has been a salutary provision in many nations. The ringleaders, however, of the conspiracy were cast into the den: for we cannot suppose that all the great men before mentioned were thus condemned, nor indeed could the lions have devoured so great a number at one time; and if he had thus punished the criminals alone, and had not cast in their wives and children with them, the sentence had been unexceptionable; but this was both unjust and cruel. Yet by this means the reality and greatness of the miracle wrought in Daniel's deliverance were evidenced: for the lions soon mastered and destroyed all that were cast into the den; by which it appeared, that they were exceedingly fierce and ravenous, and only restrained by a supernatural power; which being removed, they became through hunger the more voracious.

V. 25--28. After this, Darius, perhaps by Daniel's counsel, and in imitation of Nebuchadnezzar's example, published an account of these facts to all his subjects, in their several languages; and decreed, that they should all fear and tremble before the God of Daniel. He spake, in this address, very honourably of the Lord, as the living God; of the immutable steadfastness of his purposes, laws, and authority; and of his power to work miracles, and to deliver his servants; and he required his people to do him honour. But we do not find that he renounced idolatry, to become his worshipper; and his language is not comparable to that of Nebuchadnezzar's after his restoration to his reason and his throne: especially it wants that savour of humiliation and self-abasement which appears in the other. These events, thus authoritatively made known through so many nations, must have exceedingly tended to prepare the way for the diffusion of further light, by the Jews who went to sojourn in different countries, and at length by the preaching of the Gospel. After this Daniel continued in authority and prosperity under Darius, and his successor Cyrus, who reigned seven years. Daniel was living in the third year of Cyrus; but probably he died not long after. (x. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9.

Piety, wisdom, and integrity, will be profitable to a man, in all possible circumstances: and they will often induce others to favour such as possess them, merely from regard to their own interests. In large kingdoms numbers must be employed in managing public affairs: but, alas, how seldom are many of them decidedly of an excellent spirit! And how seldom do kings prefer men entirely on that account! Yet nothing else can fully prevent damage to both prince and people. In some cases men may continue in favour and power, notwithstanding repeated and entire revolutions; not by a criminal fickleness, but through an immovable adherence to integrity and prudence, and a readiness by every lawful means to do good to mankind.—Extraordinary honour, wisdom, or exaltation, always excites envy and enmity; but especially where one man's inflexible honesty disappoints or detects the iniquity and avarice of numbers. They, that are thus exposed to the view, malice, and severe scrutiny of multitudes, who are their competitors and enemies, have need to act with great circumspection and wisdom; that no fault or error, no evil, or appearance of evil, may be found in them: and it is very honourable to God and religion, when the most enraged and pertinacious opponents can find no fault with any part of the conduct of an eminent believer, except they can convert his piety and steadfastness in the faith, into an accusation against him. He, who enabled Daniel thus to "walk in wisdom towards them that were without," in his difficult situation, and thus wrought more powerfully than when he protected him in the den of lions, is equally able to give us wisdom and grace sufficient for us, that we may copy his example, and by well-doing put to shame and silence those that would falsely accuse our good conversation in Christ. Yet this conduct of believers often drives their enemies to open persecution, as their only weapon. How much are powerful princes surrounded by designing men, whose flatteries are the covering of their malice and selfishness! and how pride and vain-glory lay men open to be imposed on by the grossest artifices! Whilst they affect to be honoured as gods, they are proved to want the understanding of men: and the palpable absurdities, which have been sanctioned by the authority of renowned monarchs, and by the approbation of senates and councils, are a libel on human nature, as if intended to expose the folly and impiety of our fallen race. It is well that no human laws can deprive us of the privilege of asking petitions of the God of heaven: for except he continually uphold, protect, and supply us, with all things needful for soul and body, we must sink into extreme misery. Were the Lord as regardless of men, as they are of him, and did he withhold his communications as long as they do their petitions and thanksgivings, they would speedily be left without comfort or hope. Yet how little is this considered! Indeed, it is to be feared, that they who, (without any prohibitory decree,) present no hearty and serious prayers to God, for more than thirty days together, are far more numerous than they who serve him continually, and worship him with bended knees and humble thankful hearts, praying and giving thanks to him three times a day. No wonder then that laws have been more frequently made to restrain, than to encourage, serious godliness: for, alas! the majority even of legislators hitherto have been strangers or enemies to the truth, and have hated it for interfering with their worldly pursuits and pleasures.

V. 10—17.

Persecuting and sanguinary laws are always enacted on false pretences, and are replete with absurdity, impiety, and injustice: but it does not behoove Christians to vent bitter complaints or sarcastical revilings. We should quietly obey God rather than man, and commit the keeping of our lives and souls to him in well-doing; and instead of intermitting the exercise of our religion to escape the cross, we should count ourselves called to make a more open profession of it: for that conduct, which in ordinary cases might appear ostentatious, becomes in other circumstances a proper protest against prevailing impiety, and an edifying example to our brethren. Such Christians, and ministers especially, as are of eminent reputation, should deem themselves, on these emergencies, called on to stand forth in the most intrepid and decided manner, and to risk all consequences by a conduct that may not be required of more obscure persons. But the most eminent servants of God will see cause to prostrate themselves before him, with every expression of the most profound reverence, humility, and self-abasement, and the most entire reliance on his mercy through the mediation of Christ. They that fill the most exalted stations, and are most extensively useful, must not only find time for communion with God, but should abound in it more than others; having more to pray and to return thanks for: and with advancing years men should grow more fervent and constant in their devotions; that the consolations of God may make up the loss of other comforts, or the want of relish for them; and that they may constantly be in a proper frame for joining the worship of the saints in light. But in this evil world, that conduct which most accords to the will of God, will often be turned into matter of accusation against us. It is, however, far “better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing:” for though pious persons cannot place much confidence in the protection even of those princes whom they have most faithfully served, and who are most convinced of their wisdom and uprightness; yet they may in all cases be assured of the divine favour and consolation. Various personal and political interests may render kings irresolute in defending their best friends against the assaults of their enemies. They may inconsiderately give the occasion of injuring them: and however displeased with themselves, or earnest in labouring to extricate them from danger, they may with sorrow find that they cannot do it, without hazarding such consequences, or making such sacrifices, as they dare not venture on. Thus, fear of man, iniquitous laws, foolish and rash measures, and malignant accusers, may concur in extorting the sentence of condemnation against those who deserve all possible honour and reward. But that God, whom believers serve continually, is able to deliver them out of every danger and temptation; and to defeat all the purposes of their persecutors to destroy them: and it is far better to trust in him than to put any confidence in princes.

V. 18—28.

Even the most powerful of men may pity where he cannot deliver, and mourn over those oppressions that he cannot redress; and be constrained or seduced into those measures which fill his heart with anguish, his conscience with remorse, and mar all his enjoyments. So vain is all earthly greatness! And so unavailing all the materials of earthly satisfaction! But the persecuted believer may be happy in the most dreary dungeon, or the most perilous situation; as nothing can exclude him from the throne of grace, or from that “peace of God which passeth all understanding.” Through faith even the mouths of lions may be stopped: if temporal safety be good for us, we shall be preserved in the very jaws of destruction: hungry lions shall be harmless as lambs, and their presence shall only tend to increase our admiration of the Lord’s power, and our gratitude for his goodness: and even Satan, that “roaring lion, who goeth about seeking whom he may devour,” shall be so restrained, that he shall not be able to harm, or even to frighten us, whilst we rest on the promises, and attend to the commandments, of our God. We should then exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man, that we may rejoice in its testimony in difficult circumstances: we should be ready to answer with meekness and kindness even those that have injured us, especially if they are sensible of their fault. However our temporal trials may end, we shall come forth of them all: and no hurt will be found on those who have believed in God and kept his way. But whilst their troubles terminate in their greater honour, comfort, and felicity: the short-lived triumphing of the wicked will end in their unpitied and irreversible ruin; in which their relatives are often involved along with them. Thus “the Lord taketh the wise in their own craftiness;” and their devices against him give him an occasion of making known his own eternal power and Godhead among the nations, and of bringing such as were far off to adore and tremble before him. He is the living and unchangeable God, who alone is steadfast for ever: his decrees, purposes, and laws, are, and ought to be, established so that none can change them: “His is the kingdom, the power,

May we then be believers and doers of the word; and not merely hear, preach, or write about it, lest we should be found at last to have deceived our own selves.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. The preceding chapter concluded the historical records, which Daniel was directed to transmit to posterity: in this he begins to relate his own prophetic visions. In the first year of Belshazzar's reign, or seventeen years before the events just recorded, a visionary representation was made to his mind in a dream, which he committed to writing, and communicated to his people. It contains for substance the same prophetic intimations with Nebuchadnezzar's dream, (ii.) but under different allusions, and with several additional circumstances.

V. 2, 3. The great sea agitated by the four winds, represented the earth and its inhabitants, as thrown into perpetual convulsions by ambitious princes and mighty conquerors; and the confusion and wild uproar excited by their furious contests for victory and dominion. The four beasts signified the same, with the four constituent parts of Nebuchadnezzar's visionary image. To his carnal mind, mighty conquerors and extensive flourishing empires would have a show of glory, which was represented by a splendid and immense image: to the spiritual mind of Daniel, they would only appear terrible, odious, and destructive, which was more aptly denoted by devouring beasts. (Note, ii. 31.) They arose out of the sea, not all at once, but one after another: which signified that these kingdoms would subvert and succeed each other, as well as acquire dominion over other nations. They were also diverse from one another, and like the image, whose head was of gold, &c. the first was the more noble, the last most terrible.

V. 4. The Chaldean empire, as advanced to its summit of prosperity under Nebuchadnezzar, and as declining under Belshazzar, was intended by this beast. The lion was an emblem of Nebuchadnezzar's courage and success in acquiring the dominion over his neighbours; and perhaps of his superior generosity and magnanimity, with which he ruled over the nations. The eagle's wings denoted the rapidity and unabated vigour with which he prosecuted his victories. But as the prophet saw this, he observed, “that the wings thereof were plucked.” After the death of Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldeans made no more conquests; several of the subjected nations revolted; the Medes and Persians soon began to straiten them; till at length Babylon was besieged and taken, and so that monarchy was terminated. No longer did this beast appear rapid in conquest, as an eagle, or courageous and terrible as a lion: but it was changed as it were into a human creature; it “stood on its feet as a man, and had a man's heart given to it.” After Nebuchadnezzar's death, the kings of Babylon became less terrible to their foes and subjects, and more cautious and even timid: till at length Belshazzar shut himself up in Babylon, not daring to face Cyrus: as a man would not venture to face a raging bear, which a lion would despise. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Whilst Daniel beheld how the first beast was weakened, he saw another beast come up out of the sea, to subvert and supplant him. This represented the kingdom of the Medes and Persians. Its emblem was a bear; less noble and courageous, but more voracious and savage, than a lion. This beast raised up itself on one side; for the Medes and Persians extended their conquests almost wholly to the west of their own countries: or, “it raised up one dominion,” (Marg.) that is, the Medes and Persians united to form one kingdom; or the Persians who were the inferior people, would acquire the chief dominion. It had also three ribs between its teeth: this is interpreted of the three kingdoms of Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt, which the Persians conquered, and grievously oppressed: thus taking the prey, as it were, out of the mouth of the Chaldeans. And there were those standing by, who called on the beast to arise and devour much flesh: this may be explained of the providential dispensations, which excited the Medes and Persians to attempt such extensive conquests; and of the cruelty of the Persian kings, which hardly ever was exceeded or equalled: but may it not also denote their attempts to subdue the Thracians, Macedonians, Greeks, and other European nations, which at length occasioned the ruin of their monarchy? ‘Their success made them more greedy of dominion.’ (Louth.)

7 After this I saw in the ^r night-visions, and, behold, ^a a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns.

V. 6. This bear having disappeared, the prophet saw an extraordinary leopard rise up in its stead. This was the emblem of the Grecian or Macedonian empire, which for the time was the most renowned in the world. It was erected by Alexander the Great on the ruins of the Persian monarchy, and it continued in four divisions under his successors. The leopard, being exceedingly fierce and swift, represented that kingdom, and especially Alexander, its founder. But the swiftness of a quadruped was not an adequate emblem of the rapidity with which he made his conquests; as he subdued nations more speedily than others could march their armies through them. The leopard had therefore four wings of a fowl upon his back.—When Alexander died, his kingdom was, after many contests among his captains, divided into four parts, Egypt, Syria, Macedonia, and Thrace, with some regions of Asia Minor. These were the four heads of this third beast; and under them dominion was given to it, till it was gradually reduced by the Romans. By the swiftness of Alexander's progress, and the victories which he obtained by small forces, it appeared that Providence gave him the empire of the world. (Louth.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, 19--26.) Many expositors have explained this fourth beast, of the successors of Alexander, and have endeavoured to make out Antiochus Epiphanes to be the little horn. But were any, or all, of Alexander's successors more powerful and dreadful than he had been? Were their conquests more extensive and destructive than his? For those of this fourth beast evidently were. The ten horns were kings, or kingdoms, (according to the language of prophecy,) all existing at once, and not individual princes rising in succession. The little horn was not one of the ten, but arose among and after them: and this beast, in one form or other, was to subsist till the establishment of the kingdom of Christ, as afterwards predicted. These reasons have induced almost all modern protestant expositors to look elsewhere for this fourth beast: and the emblems are so apposite, that there can be little danger of mistake, or reason for hesitation, as to the grand outlines. This fourth beast evidently accords with the legs and feet of iron, which were seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his visionary image, and which were at length divided into ten toes, (Notes, ii. 40--45.) It far exceeded in power, fierceness, and destructive rage, all that had gone before it: as well as in the extent and long duration of its dominions: and no animal could be found so terrible and furious as to lend it a suitable name. This was doubtless an emblem of the Roman state, the invincible fortitude, hardness, and force of which perhaps were never equalled. By wars and conquests the Romans bore down all opposition, and reduced almost every kingdom or state in the known world into some kind or degree of dependence; drew all the spoil and wealth of many conquered nations to enrich their proud capital; and tyrannized over all that did not quietly yield obedience to their authority. That which the Romans could not quietly enjoy in other countries, they would give to other kings and rulers, that, at all times when they would, they might take it again; which liberality is here called, stamping the rest under their feet. This fourth empire was governed in another manner, and by other maxims than any of the preceding: and in process of time it was divided into ten kingdoms, which have been thus numbered in the eighth century. 1. The senate of Rome. 2. The Greeks at Ravenna. 3. The Lombards in Lombardy. 4. The Huns of Hungary. 5. The Alemanes in Germany. 6. The Franks in France. 7. The Burgundians in Burgundy. 8. The Goths in Spain. 9. The Britons. 10. The Saxons in Britain. They are indeed reckoned up in several ways, by different writers, according to the date assigned to their enumeration: but in general it is clear that they were nearly the same with the principal kingdoms in Europe at this day; excepting some of the more northern regions, and those possessed by the Turks.—It is, however, certain, that the Roman empire was divided into ten kingdoms: and though they might be sometimes more and sometimes fewer, yet they were still known by the name of the ten kingdoms of the western empire. For though the Romans subdued those countries in the east, which had successively belonged to the Chaldeans, the Persians, and the Macedonians, yet their empire, (or the body, head, and horns of the beast,) was in the west. All the four beasts are still alive, though the dominion of the three first be taken away. The nations of Chaldea and Assyria are still the first beast. Those of Media and Persia are still the second beast. Those of Macedonia, Greece, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, are still the third; and those of Europe, on this side Greece, are still the fourth. Seeing therefore the body of the third beast is confined to the nations on this side the river Euphrates; and the body of the fourth beast, to the nations on this side Greece; we are to look for all the four heads of the third beast, among the nations on this side the Euphrates; and for all the eleven horns of the fourth beast, among the nations on this side of Greece. And therefore at the breaking of the Greek empire into four kingdoms, we include no part of the Chaldeans, Medes, and Persians, in those kingdoms; because they belonged to the bodies of the two first beasts. Nor do we reckon the Greek empire seated at Constantinople, among the horns of the fourth beast;

‘because it belonged to the body of the third.’ (Sir Is. Newton.) Whilst the prophet was considering these ten horns, he saw another little horn springing up among them. This evidently points out the power of the Church and Bishop of Rome, which, from small beginnings, trust itself up among the ten kingdoms, and at length got possession of three of them, having turned out those who held them: viz. the Exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the state of Rome, (according to the most probable opinion; and the dominion of the Roman Pontiff over these three kingdoms has ever since been denoted by his triple crown. In this horn, as the Church of Rome became, when it obtained temporal authority,) were “eyes like the eyes of a man.” This circumstance denoted the policy, sagacity, subtlety, and watchfulness, by which the little horn would spy out occasions of extending and establishing its interests, and advancing its exorbitant pretensions; and the court of Rome has ever been remarkable for this above all the states in the world, as every person at all acquainted with history must know. It had also a mouth speaking great things: and we shall have frequent occasion to speak of the arrogant claims, blasphemous titles, and great swelling words of vanity, of this horn. The style of “his holiness,” and the claim of infallibility, and of a power to dispense with God’s laws, to forgive sins, and to sell admission into heaven, may serve for a specimen of the great things which this mouth hath spoken. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9-14. The prophet continued to contemplate the scene till at length all these thrones were cast down; and the Ancient of days, or the eternal God, who existed before time was, even from everlasting, was emblematically represented as placed on his throne. “His garment white as snow,” was the emblem of his most perfect justice and holiness; “the hair of his head like the pure wool,” denoted his unerring wisdom and awful majesty; “his throne like the fiery flame,” signified his terrible vengeance on the wicked; and “his wheels” (on which it was fixed as a chariot; “as burning fire,” showed that his providence would execute the awful sentence of his justice on his enemies. (Marg. Ref.) This was also denoted, and its terror illustrated, by “the fiery stream that came forth from before him.” An immense multitude of angels ministered unto him; and unnumbered millions of his creatures were gathered before his tribunal; for “the judgment was set, and the books were opened;” the book of his law, and of these prophecies, and the register of the offences of the criminals to be judged, &c. This language is applicable to the general judgment, but that cannot be the prophetic meaning of the passage; for it is plain that God the Father is here spoken of as the Judge: whereas the Son will appear as the sole Judge in the day of final retribution: the fulfilment of this prophecy will precede the introduction of the millennium, the final judgment will succeed to the consummation of all things here on earth. In short, this was spoken of the coming of the Lord to destroy the kingdom of antichrist, and to set up the kingdom of God on earth. For the great God, being filled with indignation at the blasphemous words of the little horn, will destroy all the remains of the power of the fourth beast, to which it belongs; that is, of the Roman empire, as inimical to the cause of Christ: and his body shall be destroyed and given to the flames, because the little horn was the ringleader to the beast, in tyranny, cruelty, and idolatry; and because of the close connexion betwixt it and the other ten horns. Rome will be wholly desolated, and her hierarchy abolished; every antichristian power will be crushed; and the whole will be reduced under the government of Christ, and those who rule under and for him. The other beasts had indeed been deprived of dominion, yet their lives were prolonged for a season: the countries that had been governed by the Chaldeans, Persians, and Macedonians, though no longer in possession of empire, yet continued under the government of idolaters, or enemies to true religion: for a beast, in the prophetic language, is an idolatrious or persecuting power: but when the fourth beast shall lose his authority, his life also shall be taken away, and no idolatrious or antichristian power shall remain in any nation; for then the other beasts must be slain, which is intimated by their lives being spared for a season. The prophet further saw one like the Son of man coming with, or in, the clouds of heaven; that is, with divine majesty and glory; this must point out Christ to us, as the eternal Son of God, appearing in human nature, ascending to heaven, the throne of God, to receive the kingdom covenanted to him; (Ps. ii. 3, 9.) He came to the Ancient of days, who sat on the throne, and was brought in before him by the angelic attendants; and he received a glorious, universal, and everlasting kingdom, which would never vanish, or be subverted, or succeeded by any other. ' This passage not only shows, that the ' setting up of the everlasting kingdom, was to happen in ' the times of the fourth, or Roman, monarchy; but also, ' that it would happen when the Son of man would ascend ' from earth to heaven. The prophet does not represent ' him as coming in the clouds from heaven to earth, (as ' at the general judgment;) but as coming with the clouds ' of heaven from his former residence, towards the throne ' of God; which according to the Scripture-style is heaven. ' And this is confirmed by the words immediately follow- ' ing; that " they brought him near before him," viz. ' before the Ancient of days.' ' Though the immediate ' Ruler of this kingdom is called the Son of man; yet it is ' obvious, that there is something very amazing in the ' prophetic description of the high honour and glory that ' should be given to him! Whoever considers these expres- ' sions, (in the fourteenth verse.) ' with impartiality,— ' whatever be his sentiments otherwise about the Person ' spoken of, must own, that there is at least some diffi- ' culty in conceiving how such everlasting glory and ' dominion should belong to any one who should be no ' more than the son of man, or a mere creature; and ' particularly in conceiving how such magnificent things ' should be ascribed to one who was no more than the son ' of man, by the prophets, who inculcated so strongly ' and justly, that all mere creatures are, before God, as ' nothing, and less than nothing.' (Maclaurin.) When ' Christ was about to ascend into heaven, he said, " All ' power is given to me in heaven and earth." Then his ' kingdom began to be set up, and the power of the fourth ' kingdom to decline: but it is plain from the eleventh verse, ' that the grand event predicted in this passage, is, his ' glorious coming to destroy the kingdom of Antichrist, and ' to render his own kingdom universal upon earth. (Marg.

Ref.) A careful examination of the marginal references will throw much light on this subject; and show the exact coincidence of the several prophetic writers, both in the Old and New Testament, in respect of these events.

V. 15-13. When Daniel had considered these emblems of future times, he foresaw that idolatrous empires would occasion much mischief to the Church of God, before a happy event could be expected; yet he did not fully understand what was meant, nor how matters would end; and he was therefore much grieved and troubled in mind. So, desiring information from one of the numerous attendants " of Him that sat on the throne," he received the following interpretation. In general, the four beasts signified four kings, or kingdoms, that were to arise up on earth, which would oppose the Church of God; yet the saints would at length take the kingdom, and possess it for ever, not only personally in heaven, but collectively on earth, after the ruin of the fourth kingdom; for they would rule with and for Christ to the end of time, and nothing would succeed this kingdom on earth but the everlasting glory of heaven. It is with reference to this, probably, that the Apostle says, " The promise, that he should " be the heir of the world was given to Abraham." (Rom. iv. 13.)

—Out of the earth. ' Shall be of the earth, earthly, ' and have nothing of an heavenly spirit in them.' (Lowth.)

V. 19-22. Daniel seems to have been satisfied with knowing in general, that the three first kingdoms would resemble such monarchies as he had seen: but he was anxious to learn more about the kingdom intended by the fourth beast, which was so different from all the rest, and so formidable with teeth of iron, and nails of brass, &c.—The nails of brass were not before mentioned. Brass was the emblem of the third kingdom in Nebuchadnezzar's dream: and some suppose this to intimate, that the fourth kingdom would employ the power of the third kingdom in the east, to oppress other nations: though the seat of the fourth kingdom, the body of the beast, was in the west! The prophet, however, supposed this to represent some more formidable enemy of the Church, than any of the others: as well as far more powerful and oppressive in its conquests. He wanted also to know something more such thing; and has multiplied his holy days, till scarcely four of the six working days have been left for man's labour: at the same time he hath licensed intemperance and excess on his festivals and carnivals, and authorized licentious diversions on the Lord's own holy day. He hath pretended to change God's laws, or to dispense with obedience to them, that his own new laws might be observed, forbidding to marry, and licensing fornication, and many things of this sort. Thus matters would be left in his hands, "till a time, and times, and the dividing of time," that is, for three years and a half, or forty-two months, which, reckoning thirty days to a month, (and this was the general computation,) make just one thousand two hundred and sixty days; and those prophetic days signify one thousand two hundred and sixty years; a number we shall repeatedly meet with in the revelation of St. John. (Marg. Ref.) At the expiration of this term, which is now not far distant, the dominion of this horn will cease; he will be judged, condemned, and consumed, and his authority never revived to the end of the world. Then "the kingdom under the whole heaven will be given to the people of the saints." The most High will set up his everlasting and universal kingdom, all other rulers and governors will serve and obey him. Can this mean any thing less, than an universal prevalence of true religion, under the countenance of Christian princes, even to the end of the world, without any remarkable declension, or successful opposition? And hath not enough of this extraordinary prophecy been already fulfilled, to warrant our assurance, that the remainder will be so too, as well as to demonstrate the divinity of the Scriptures?—Thus the "second as well as the first prophecy of this book, relating to the four empires, reaches down below the end of the Roman empire, and to the universal empire of the Messiah."—"The great things said to be done by the little horn, and the continuance of his power to the time of the universal conversion of the nations, put it beyond all question, that it is not one particular person that is meant, but a very long succession."—"He is never called any other than a little horn.—His greatness is chiefly placed in great words and looks, joined with singular penetration and cunning; which is of itself a presumption, that the great things he was to accomplish would be owing to the power of others, voluntarily giving their power to him, after having been seduced by him."—"The following small number of characters, to be gathered by plain and easy reasoning from a few passages in one prophet, (Daniel), make up a singular description, not applicable to any power, that ever was, or will be, but one."—"A seducing power that was to arise, after the conversion, the downfall and division of the Roman empire, established in the western parts of that empire, when divided into so many, (ten) sovereignties; little, in comparison of these others as to secular authority; but claiming and obtaining an univer-

(Maclaurin.)

V. 23. Daniel, from this interpretation, foreseeing the calamities of the Church, for so long a season previous to the joyful termination of them, was greatly troubled in mind, which affected his body also. He, however, laid up the matter in his memory and heart, that he might meditate on it, and derive instruction from it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Those splendid achievements, and that extensive authority, which excite admiration, applause, envy, or ambition, often rank men with destructive hurricanes and savage beasts, in the judgment of God and of his saints. They are the instruments of divine vengeance on a guilty world, which is kept in perpetual agitation by their contentions; as the great sea by the raging of the conflicting winds. They are indeed diverse from each other; but they agree in their aim to aggrandize themselves, and to gain the dominion, by making havoc of the human species, and trampling men under their feet; and many around them, by their flattering encomiums and delusive oratory, call on them "to arise and devour much flesh." The greater renown such chieftains receive with posterity, the more mischievous were they to their contemporaries: and whilst our youth are taught to admire the exploits of the Greeks and Romans; they are seldom led to reflect on the dire carnage and wide-spread desolations, which their wars occasioned. No savage beast, nor even the worst qualities of them all put together, can equal the odious constituents of an ambitious conqueror's character: and an Alexander, or a Julius Cæsar, may be considered as a compound of pride, ambition, selfishness, rage, and cruelty; whilst he can glory in the slaughter of a million of his own species, for the sole purpose of advancing his own reputation and greatness, or of extending the dominions and wealth of his idolized country. But when we look at such beasts as dreadful and terrible, and exceedingly strong, and consider their fatal successes: we should recollect, that they are under the secret direction of God, whose "counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" and thus we shall be preserved from either admiring or dreading them. For these lions, and monsters of more savage breed, are all chained: the dominion given them has its appointed extent and duration; their wrath shall turn to the praise of the Lord, and the remainder of it he will restrain. Whilst he has work for them as his executioners, they have rapid success; when that is done, they disappear or are broken in pieces: and as one of them after another is removed, and the earth seems to be at rest, being delivered from a scourge and a curse, another perhaps rises up still more outrageous and mischievous. But in whatever form, age, or place, they practice and prosper; or whatever be their courage and sagacity, or their arrogance, impiety, and cruelty, in war, or in persecution; their thrones will be cast down, to make way for the kingdom of the Ancient of days, the everlasting God, whose works and counsels are all in glorious justice, holiness, wisdom, and majesty; and whose wrath is a devouring fire against all his enemies. He will put down all authority that exalteth itself against him; and the terrible displays of his power and wrath, in his temporal judgments on the nations, form an emblem of that day, when we must all appear before his tribunal, to give an account of our works; “when the books shall be opened, and all whose names shall not be found written in the book of life, will be cast into the lake of fire;” “when thousand thousands shall minister unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand shall stand before him.” Ere that solemn decisive season shall arrive, for the manifestation of the Lord’s glory to all worlds, in his dealings with his creatures, the doom of each of us will be determined, at the hour of our death: and before the end shall come, the Father will openly and actually give unto his incarnate Son, our Mediator and Judge, the inheritance of the nations, as his willing subjects. Of this he gave a proof, when he raised him from the dead, and gave him glory; when he ascended up on high, and was brought by his attending angels before the Ancient of days, and all power in heaven and earth was given to him.

Hitherto it hath been permitted, that the depravity of man should be exposed, in the conduct of many rivals and competitors to the Lord of Glory; of many Antichrists, who have opposed his cause, and made havoc of innumerable multitudes of his saints; and have prevented the success of their efforts in spreading that glorious cause, which they loved more than their lives. Yet they have never prevented the eternal felicity of any one chosen vessel of mercy; nor could the gates of hell ever prevail against the Church. Idolatry, impiety, arrogance, and persecution, have generally been concomitants; and have always been odious and pernicious; but never so odious and pernicious, as when covered with a mask of religion. There have been and will be many Antichrists: but he “that sits in the temple of God, and exalts himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped,” hath been more fierce and stout than his fellows; and hath worn out the saints of the most High, and thought to change times and laws, more than they all: and this condemnation will be proportionably dreadful; for the judgment shall sit, and “the Lord will destroy him with the breath of his mouth, and with the brightness of his coming.” Other tyrants and persecutors may be spared for a season, even when dethroned; but this enemy shall be wholly destroyed, and cast into the fire. Then all idolatry and false worship shall cease, and our Redeemer shall receive dominion and glory, and a kingdom over all people, nations, and languages, which shall never pass away nor be destroyed.—We must not indeed be ambitious of temporal power, nor use unhallowed means to subvert even Antichristian tyranny: but we may pray to the Lord to plead his own cause, and fulfil his word, and to make his truth victorious: we may desire to be instrumental in forwarding these happy events, in any way in which it may please God to employ us: and we may anticipate with joy those glorious times, when all nations shall fall down before our Redeemer, “and all kings shall do him service;” and when every throne on earth shall be filled by those that do his will and seek his glory. We should make serious inquiry into these matters, as well as into other parts of God’s word: and, by proper examination and humble prayer, we shall thence deduce encouragement to our hope, and find strength added to our faith. We should keep them in our hearts, and expect the approaching period, when the saints shall receive the kingdom, and their cause shall finally triumph over all opposition: and the trouble, arising from the views which we receive of the sufferings to be endured by God’s people, will be counterbalanced by the expectation of so glorious a catastrophe. May we be numbered with the saints, now they are under the cross, that we may share all their triumphs, and be numbered with them in glory everlasting.

6 And he came to the ram that had two horns, ¹ which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power.

7 And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns; and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, ^m but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand.

city of the Persian empire; and many commentators suppose, that Daniel was there only in vision, (as Ezekiel had been carried to Jerusalem) and that he was actually at Babylon at the time: for they cannot conceive what he should do at Shushan, when Belshazzar, who employed him, was at war with the Medes and Persians. But he might be at Shushan, as employed in some embassy from Belshazzar to Cyrus, or some of the parties engaged in war against him. It is, however, probable that Shushan was at this time in the hands of the king of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar conquered Elam, according to Jeremiah's prediction; (Jer. xlix. 34—39;) and it does not appear that Cyrus had at this time retaken it. Elam is indeed sometimes used for Persia; but the province of Elam was only a part of that country. Daniel's residing in the palace at Shushan, shows that he still continued in those posts of honour to which Nebuchadnezzar had advanced him; (27.) (Lowth.)

V. 3, 4. The kingdom of Media and Persia, before represented by a voracious bear, (vii. 5,) was on this occasion shown to Daniel, under the form of a ram with two horns. (20.) The bear aptly described the nature of this monarchy; but the ram with two horns, was its known emblem in those countries. The original word for a ram, and that for Elam, or Persia, have a great affinity: it was usual for the kings of Persia to wear a diadem made like a ram's head, of gold: and it is said, that "rams' heads with horns, one higher and the other lower, are still to be seen on the pillars at Persepolis." The Chaldean monarchy was drawing near to its end, when Daniel had this vision; and its subversion had been sufficiently predicted: this vision therefore was introduced by the emblem of the Medo-Persian empire. The two horns of this ram, one higher than the other, do not mean Darius and Cyrus, or any two princes; for the ram had two horns, when he was smitten by the goat, or the Macedonians: but they signify the joint power of the Medes and Persians forming one monarchy. The Medes were the most ancient of the two nations, and had been most eminent; but the Persians became most powerful and renowned: so that the higher horn came up last. This ram, though comparatively so feeble an animal, was seen pushing with his horns, westward, northward, and southward, so that none could withstand or escape him, or prevent his executing his purposes, and becoming great. Persia lay to the east of Babylon; and the kings extended their conquests westward, as far as the Egean sea; north and north-west, they subdued various people even to the Caspian and Euxine sea; and to the south and south-west, they vanquished Egypt and several of the adjacent regions. Some of the later kings of Persia indeed carried their arms also into the east; but this was not within the observation of the Jews, or of much consequence to them.

V. 5—7. Whilst the prophet beheld with astonishment the fury and success of the ram, he observed an he-goat come from the west to oppose him: this was afterwards interpreted to mean the kingdom of Greece or Macedonia. A goat was the known emblem of this kingdom; and the Macedonians had been long called the goats' people: 'For Caranus going with a great multitude of Greeks, to seek new habitations in Macedonia, was commanded by the oracle to take the goats for his guides to empire; and afterwards seeing a herd of goats fleeing from a violent storm; he followed them to Edessa, and there fixed the seat of the empire, made the goats his ensigns, and called the city Ægæe, or the goats' town, and the people Ægæada, or the goats' people.' (Bp. Newton.) The Persian kings had made many very formidable but unsuccessful attempts to subdue the Greeks, and by repeated injuries they had so exasperated the whole nation, that laying aside their quarrels with each other, they united against the common enemy. The politics and successes of Philip, king of Macedon, and other circumstances, had concurred to make way for Alexander the Great to accomplish his design of leading an army into Asia, to conquer if possible the Persian empire. With a small body of most valiant and well disciplined soldiers, the flower of Greece and Macedon, he marched into Asia; and his progress and successes were so rapid, that his army seemed, as it were, to fly above, and not to touch the surface of the earth: and when Darius the Persian king came to meet him, with armies perhaps twenty times as large, he was attacked with such impetuosity, and routed with such immense slaughter, that by the loss of three great battles, his power was utterly broken, he was pursued as a fugitive, and at length slain by his own servants.

3 Therefore the he-goat waxed very great: and ^u when he was strong, ^v the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones, toward the four winds of heaven.

9 And out of one of them ^w came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward ^x the pleasant land.

10 And it waxed great, even * to the ^y host of heaven, and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, ^z and stamped upon them.

11 Yea, ¹ he magnified himself even [†] to ² the prince of the host, and [‡] by him ³ the daily sacrifice was taken away, [§] and the place of his sanctuary was cast down.

12 And [¶] an host was ⁷ given him against the daily sacrifice, by reason of transgression, ⁸ and it cast down the truth to the ground; ⁹ and it practised, and prospered.

Afterwards Alexander with unexampled celerity marched his forces into every part of this vast empire, bearing down all opposition, and receiving the submission of cities and nations; till the ram, the Medo-Persian kingdom, was cast down to the ground, and trodden under foot by the victor, and none could deliver it, or any part of it, out of the hands of the Macedonians. When Alexander first menaced Asia with an invasion, Darius treated his proposals and designs with the most affronting contempt; and he afterwards attempted to bribe his physician to poison him: these injuries had so exasperated the king and his troops, that they pursued Darius rather as an assassin, than as a competitor for honour and empire; and the he-goat attacked the ram, as moved with choler against him. It is recorded, that this prophecy was shown to Alexander by the Jewish high priest on the following occasion. Whilst Alexander besieged Tyre, the high priest of the Jews refused to pay tribute to him, because he had sworn allegiance to Darius; and this refusal so enraged the conqueror, that he set out in great haste to avenge himself on that nation. But in answer to the prayers of the high-priest and people, the former was directed in a vision to go forth to meet Alexander, in his pontifical vestments, attended by the other priests in their sacred apparel: and when the enraged victor met this procession, he bowed down before the high-priest with religious awe and veneration. This behaviour astonished all present; but he informed them, that whilst he was planning his expedition at Dio in Macedonia, he had seen in a dream this very person in this very habit, inviting him to come into Asia, and promising him success in his expedition; and that he now meant to adore the God of the Jews, (who had directed and prospered his expedition,) in the person of his high-priest. Accordingly he peaceably entered Jerusalem, and offered sacrifices at the temple, where the high-priest showed him these prophecies of Daniel, in which it was foretold that a king of Greece should subvert the Persian empire. It is certain that Alexander granted many peculiar privileges to the Jewish nation; and this can hardly be accounted for without admitting the truth of these events as recorded by Josephus.

were extinct; and then the great and notable horn of the goat was broken. Afterwards his captains had fierce contests about his dominions; till at length, four kingdoms arose, which continued for some time, and were eminent in the world: the kingdom of Egypt was to the south; that of Syria, and its dependencies to the east; that of Thrace, with Bythia, &c. to the north; and that of Macedonia to the west. (22.) Thus four horns sprang up from the head of the goat, in the place of the one which had been broken: but the power neither continued in the same family, nor was any one of these kingdoms equal to that of Alexander himself.

V. 9-12. (23-25.) The generality of expositors have interpreted this little horn to mean Antiochus Epiphanes, of whose persecutions we have an account in the books of Maccabees; and some have considered him as a type of Antichrist. Others, however, have attempted to show that this interpretation is not at all satisfactory; and they have given us quite another view of the subject. According to the first opinion, this part of prophecy may be interpreted as follows. From one of the four kingdoms, into which the dominions of Alexander were divided, came forth a little horn; which represented Antiochus Epiphanes, descending from the kings of Syria. This would occur "in the latter time of their kingdom," (23.) and Antiochus Epiphanes lived but a little time, before the Romans subdued the several divisions of the Grecian empire: it would also be "when the transgressors were come to the full;" that is, when the Jews had made themselves ripe for judgment by their crimes. This horn denoted "a king of fierce countenance;" and Antiochus was of a most ferocious cruelty; and one that "understood dark sentences;" and he was a man of designing subtlety. "His power would become mighty, but not by his own power;" which may mean, that from very low beginnings he would arise to great prosperity, not by the strength of his own kingdom, but by the assistance of his allies. For after the Romans had conquered his father Antiochus the Great, and exceedingly weakened his dominions; and Seleucus, his brother, had drained all his treasures to pay the sums stipulated to the Romans; Antiochus, who had been a hostage at Rome, hearing of his brother's death, returned home in a very obscure manner and low condition; but being favoured by Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and by others, he obtained the kingdom in preference to his brother's posterity, and became in time powerful and formidable: carrying war into Egypt, to the south, and into

V. 8. (Note, vii. 6.) After the Macedonian kingdom had arrived at vast greatness and power, Alexander was cut off, when he was in the prime of his life, and in the full career of victory and prosperity; through excessive intemperance, and not without the suspicion of poison. Persia, Armenia, &c.' to the east; and especially he subdued and oppressed the land of Judah, called the Pleasant Land, because of the temple and ordinances of God. Thus "he waxed great," and grew very proud, and employed his power "against the host of heaven," and "cast down" some of the stars to the ground, and stamped on "them;" this figuratively described his persecution of God's worshippers, and the cruelties which he exercised against many of the brightest, most excellent, and eminent persons among them. And he not only magnified himself against the high-priest, and the rulers of the Jews; but against God himself, "the Prince of this host," the Prince of princes: for he set up the image of Jupiter Olympus in the temple, profaned every thing with swine's flesh, compelled the Jews to blaspheme God; put a stop to the administration of all the sacred institutions, and desolated and polluted the whole sanctuary. For, to punish the sins of the Jews, "an host was given him against the "daily sacrifice," i. e. God gave him power to prevail against it; so that the truth was by him cast down to the ground, and he practised wickedness, and prospered in it: destroying the mighty and holy people of God, and accomplishing his deep and dark machinations, by the most crafty politics; behaving with the utmost contempt and arrogance; and making and infringing solemn treaties and agreements, to compass the destruction of multitudes. But at length, when he was coming, full of rage to execute vengeance on the Jews, who opposed his tyranny, he was seized with a most loathsome and dire disease, and died miserably, by the evident judgment of God, without the intervention of any human power. But many strong objections may be made to this interpretation, even supposing Antiochus be allowed to have been a type of Antichrist. — 'A horn of a beast is never taken for a single person: it always signifies a new kingdom; and the kingdom of Antiochus was an old one. Antiochus reigned over one of the four horns; and the little horn was a fifth, under its proper kings. This horn was at first a little one, and waxed exceeding great; but so did not Antiochus. It is described great above all the former horns; and so was not Antiochus. His kingdom on the contrary was weak, and tributary to the Romans; and he did not enlarge it. The horn was "a king of fierce countenance, and destroyed wonderfully, and prospered and practised;" — but Antiochus was frighted out of Egypt by a mere message of the Romans, and afterwards routed and baffled by the Jews. The horn was mighty by another's power; Antiochus acted by his own. The horn cast down the sanctuary to the ground; and so did not Antiochus, he left it standing. The sanctuary and host were trampled under foot two thousand and three hundred days, (14;) and in Daniel's prophecies days are put for years; but the profanation of the temple in the reign of Antiochus did not last so many natural days. These were to last to the end of the indignation against the Jews; and this indignation is not yet at an end. They were to last till the sanctuary which should be cast down should be cleansed; and the sanctuary is not yet cleansed.' (Sir

Is. Newton.) Antiochus's 'kingdom was nothing more than a continuation of one of the four kingdoms; and cannot possibly be considered as a fifth kingdom springing up among the four.' When he stood up, "the transgressors of the Jewish nation were not come to the full." The holy city was inhabited with all peace; and the laws were kept very well; because of the godliness of Onias the high-priest, and his hatred of wickedness.' (2 Mac. iii. 1.) (Bp. Newton.) These and other expositors therefore suppose this little horn, coming forth from one of the former horns, to mean the empire of the Romans, from the time when they had got footing in Greece and Macedonia; which formed one horn of the goat. They then entered on that stage, on which these events were to take place. At first they seemed to have little power within the regions which Alexander had governed; yet that increased exceedingly, by the forces brought from Rome and Italy: and as these formed no part of this goat, the horn grew strong, not by its own power. It is well known how the Romans, (from that time, when they got footing within one of the horns of the goat, and succeeded to the dominions meant by that horn,) extended their conquest eastward into Asia, and through almost all the regions conquered by Alexander; at length conquering Judea and Egypt, as well as other southern regions in Africa. This was in the latter times of the Macedonian kingdom, and terminated in its utter subversion: and the Jews had more entirely filled up their measure of transgression before their grievous sufferings by the Romans, than when Antiochus began to oppress them. Antiochus was ferocious, but he was far from being remarkable for courage: but no people were ever so renowned for this quality as the Romans, or laid their schemes of universal empire in such deep and sound policy, or waxed great as they did. The calamities brought on the Jews by Antiochus were slight and transient, compared with those which they at length endured from the Romans; when Jerusalem was besieged, and taken with most tremendous slaughter; when their whole civil and religious constitution was subverted and destroyed; when the whole of that people were treated with the most cruel contempt; when the city and temple were utterly destroyed, their ritual worship finally terminated, and their poor remains dispersed, as slaves and vagabonds, throughout the earth. And after these events had begun to take place, the Roman emperors, when at the summit of their greatness, became terrible persecutors of the Christian Church, putting to death many of the brightest ornaments of the Gospel, especially several of the apostles of Christ. Yea, they "magnified themselves against this Prince of the host," this King of kings; both as Pilate the Roman governor ordered his crucifixion, and as they persecuted his followers for three centuries. And after the emperors became Christians, the civil authority of Rome was gradually weakened, and the empire began to be divided: and then the church and bishop of that city arose to great dominion, by power given from others; and they have proved "rulers of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences;" being ever notorious for savage cruelty, and dark machinations against their opposers. By craftily engaging the princes of their communion to fight their battles, and destroy heretics, (as they call them,) and by a succession of most insidious schemes, they ⁴⁴ have cast down the truth to the "ground, and practised, and prospered." Their professed friendship, peace, or alliance, has often proved more destructive than their open enmity; as they have not scrupled to violate the most sacred engagements, and to massacre and murder, in defiance of oaths, covenants, and safe conducts. Thus have they stood up, and "magnified themselves against the Prince of the host;" they have desolated the sanctuary of God, put a stop to the pure administration of his ordinances, and cast down his truth to the ground. But in due time this power will be broken without hand, by the immediate judgment of God. The expression, that the vision was to be shut up, for it should be for many days, leads our thoughts to later times than those of Antiochus Epiphanes, whose persecutions commenced about three hundred and eighty years after Daniel had his vision: and to more continued oppressions than those which he occasioned, which were as nothing, compared with what both Jews and Christians have experienced from Rome, Pagan and Antichristian. As Rome imperial cast down the city of Jerusalem and the temple to the ground, to be trodden under-foot of the Gentiles; so Rome papal hath cast down, and trampled upon the truths, ordinances, and people of Christ, more than any other power ever did. Indeed Rome has hitherto been the grand enemy to Christ and true Christianity, under whatever form that enmity hath been exercised: and the prophecy will not be wholly accomplished, till that Antichristian power shall be finally destroyed.

V. 13, 14. 'The word rendered here "certain saint," is translated in the margin, "the numberer of secrets," or, "the wonderful numberer," and must mean a person of extraordinary rank, as being able to unfold those secrets which were hid from angels; and is therefore justly supposed to mean the Son of God, called the WONDERFUL COUNSELLOR, as being acquainted with all God's purposes and designs, (John i. 13.) The words may be rendered, "For how long a time shall the vision last, the daily sacrifice be taken away, and the transgression of desolation continue." This computation of time, in its obvious sense, contains something more than six years and four months, reckoning three hundred and sixty days to a year: and, if we explain it with relation to the persecution set on foot by Antiochus, we must date it, not from the height of the persecution, when the daily sacrifice was actually taken away; for that continued but just three years, 1 Mac. i. 54, iv. 52;) but— from the rise of those transgressions which occasioned

'the desolation.' 'But since it is generally agreed, that the persecution of Antiochus was an imperfect representation of a greater desolation, which Antichrist should make in the Church: (Compare 13. with xii. 11.) it is the opinion of some learned men, that these two thousand three hundred days are a line of time, that is to be extended to the end of the times of Antichrist; taking each day for a year.' (Lowth.) 'The difficulty, or impossibility rather, of making these two thousand three hundred years accord with the times of Antiochus, I suppose, obliged the ancients to consider Antiochus as the type of Antichrist.' 'The question was asked, not only how long the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the transgression of desolation continue, but also how long the vision shall last? So the answer is to be understood; and these days the whole time from the beginning of the vision to the cleansing of the sanctuary.'—These days, or years, I conceive,—are to be computed from the vision of the he-goat, or Alexander's invading Asia, before Christ 334. Two thousand three hundred years from that time will draw towards the conclusion of the sixth millennium of the world; and about that period, an old tradition, which was current before our Saviour's time, and was probably founded on the prophecies, great changes and revolutions are to be expected; and particularly as Rabbi Abraham Sebah saith, Rome is to be overthrown, and the Jews restored.' (Bp. Newton.)—Some difficulty is found, in determining the precise time from which to date these two thousand three hundred years: and the case is the same, in respect of the thousand two hundred and sixty years, in different ways repeatedly stated to be the term of the desolations or captivity of the Church, both by Daniel and St. John. But nearly a thousand years must be allowed, as intervening between the former and the latter: the two thousand three hundred days, or years, may be supposed to have distinct dates, both for commencement and termination, according to the several steps, by which the predicted events had their beginning, and will at length come to an end. Thus it was with the Babylonish captivity, and the event alone, it is probable, will clear up all the difficulties, in which these calculations must of course be previously involved. It may perhaps be worthy of notice, that it is now about two thousand three hundred and fifty-eight years since Daniel had this vision; and no doubt the end of the two thousand and three hundred days, or years, is not very distant. The marginal references show, that the words rendered "the transgression of desolation," are referred in the New Testament to events which occurred long after the persecution of Antiochus; and especially to the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

V. 15-19. We may suppose, that the eternal Son of God stood before the prophet, in the appearance of a man, and with a human voice called unto the angel Gabriel, to explain the vision to him. 'The power to command the angel showed it was God.' But the glory of what he saw, and the overpowering influences of the prophetic Spirit, filled Daniel with terror and astonishment: so that he fell on his face, and sunk into a deep sleep; until he was awake, and raised up, and made to know what would come upon his people, in the last end of the indignation, and about the time appointed for the termination of it.—But in what sense could Antiochus's persecutions be called the last end of the indignation; seeing the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans was to follow, and all the calamities of the Jews to this day? If we understand it of the evils brought on both Jews and Christians by Rome: we shall then see, what is to be the last end of God's indignation against his Church; and when this expires, his people will have peace and prosperity to the end of the world. The phrase here used, "the time of the end," also constrains the interpreter to look forward far beyond the days of Antiochus. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. 'Four kingdoms shall be set up by Alexander's generals, who shall be of the same nation with him, although not of his posterity; nor shall they have that power or extent of dominion which he possessed.' (Louth.)

V. 23, 24. (9-12.) 'Greece was the chief province of this empire, from whence it had its original and name.' (Javan 21. Heb. whence Ionia, Marg. Ref.) 'The bringing this country into subjection to the Roman power was a manifest indication of the declension of the third monarchy, and the advancement of the fourth.—This was brought to pass, when Emilius, the Roman Consul, vanquished Perseus king of Macedon, and thereby brought all Greece under the power of the Romans; about the time when Antiochus set up "the abomination of desolation," in the temple at Jerusalem.' (Louth.) 'This kingdom, by the victory of the Romans over Perseus, ceased to be one of the four horns of the goat, and became a dominion of a new sort; not a horn of the fourth beast, for Macedonia belonged to the body of the third; but a horn of the goat, which grew mighty, not by his own power; a horn which grew potent by the power of the Romans.' (Sir Is. Newton.) —'When the Romans first got footing in Greece, then they became a horn of the goat: and their actions within the dominions of the goat, and not their affairs in the western empire, are the principal subjects of this prophecy; particularly their great persecution and oppression of the people of God; which renders it probable, that the appellation of "the little horn" might be given them for the same reason, that the great persecutor and oppressor of the saints in the western Church is also called "the little horn." (Bp. Newton.) The Romans stood up in the latter part of the kingdom of the he-goat; for they saw the end of all the four kingdoms represented by his four horns. The transgressions of the Jews also were, in their days, come to the full; and the Romans were the instruments of Providence in bringing wrath to the uttermost on that people. 'The Romans were represented in the former vision, by "a beast dreadful and terrible;" they are here denominated "a king of fierce countenance. Understanding dark sentences" in Syriac is translated "skilful of ruling," and in the Arabic, "skilful of disputations." 'We may suppose the meaning to be, that this should be a politic and artful, as well as a formidable power, which is not so properly the character of Antiochus as of the Romans.' 'It was not by the malice of the Jews, but by the authority of the Romans, that the Messiah, (the Prince of princes,) was put to death: and he suffered the punishment of Roman malefactors and slaves. Indeed, it is very worthy our most serious consideration, whether this part of the prophecy be not a sketch of the sufferings of the Christian, as well as of the Jewish Church. Nothing is more usual with the prophets, than to describe the religion and worship of later times, by metaphors taken from their own religion. The Romans, not only crucified our Saviour, but also persecuted his apostles for above three centuries: and when at length they embraced the Christian religion, they soon corrupted it. As the power of the Roman Emperors declined,

How applicable in this ^f sense is every part of the angel's interpretation! The ^h persecuting power of Rome, whether exercised towards ⁱ the Jews, or towards the Christians; by the emperors or ^d by the popes, is still meant "the little horn." The tyranny ^k is the same; but as exerted in Greece and in the east, it ^l is the little horn of the he-goat; as exerted in Italy and ^m the west, it is the little horn of the fourth beast." (Bp. Newton).—The remarkable coincidence of so many prophecies, in respect of these events, forms a most cogent proof, that this is the grand outline of the genuine interpretation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. (Marg. Ref.) No power was ever so crafty and politic, as that "man of sin, whom the Lord will "destroy with the brightness of his coming." (2 Thes. ii. 3—12.) Indeed every character of this little horn more exactly suits papal than pagan Rome; though I apprehend both are predicted; that is, Rome per-erating the Church, from her first obtaining power in the east, till the destruction of the city and the introduction of the millennium.

V. 27. "The vision of the two thousand three hundred 'mornings and evenings mentioned in the fourteenth verse." (Marg.) (Lowth.)—"The "shutting up of the vision," implies that it should not be understood for some time; and we cannot say that it was sufficiently understood, so ^c long as Antiochus Epiphanes was taken for the little ^d horn. The vision being "for many days," must necessarily infer a longer term than the calamity under ^e Antiochus, of three years, or three years and a half.—Such a vision could not well be called long to Daniel, ^f who had seen so much longer before.—Two thousand ^g three hundred years.—may properly enough be said to be "for many days." (Bp. Newton.)

V. 27. Daniel's fainting, sickness, and astonishment, at the prospect of the evils which he saw coming on his people and on the Church, are circumstances which favour the supposition, that vastly more durable calamities were apprehended than those under Antiochus; for these bore no proportion to what the Jews had endured from the Chaldeans, and from which they were not at that time delivered. He, however, at length recovered his health and composure, and attended to the business about which the king had employed him; though he had only a very imperfect understanding of this extraordinary vision.

people to whom they were specially addressed; so ought they to be faithfully translated into the vulgar tongue of every country to which they are sent; that men may have free access to them, and by them be made wise unto eternal salvation. Indeed every thing in religion should be made as plain as possible to the meanest capacities of the most illiterate; and whatever counteracts this intention, savours more of the subtlety of Antichrist, than of the wisdom and simplicity of Christ. No wonder, ^h when holy men of God spake as they were moved by "the Holy Ghost," that they declared future events as if they had been eye-witnesses of the performance of them. To "this light, that shineth in a dark place, we shall do ⁱ well to take heed," until the day of glory dawn in our hearts, and the witness in ourselves establish at once our belief of the truth of the Scriptures, and of our own interest in the blessings therein revealed. The most feeble of the creatures would become formidable enemies, if God were pleased to employ them against us; and it often happens, in providence as well as in grace, that "the first be ^j come last and the last first." Powerful men commonly employ themselves in pushing down their neighbours, and trampling upon them; they are not willing that any should stand before or escape them; but they desire to do their own will, and become unrivalled in greatness, whatever mischiefs they bring upon others. But such men lay the axe to the root of their own greatness: they multiply enemies along with their successes: and thus others are excited to avenge the cause of the oppressed, and to fulfil God's righteous judgments; even when urged forward by their own impetuous ambition, rapacity, or resentment. Whilst prosperous warriors thus drive furiously, and carry all before them, and millions admire their consummate valour and conduct, or their good fortune; perhaps their enterprises are little better than madness, though rendered successful by Providence, till they have reached their appointed limits, and then in the midst of their career of prosperity they are suddenly removed; and whilst men dispute about the second causes of the disaster, it is plain that the great first Cause of all had no more of his plan for them to execute, and therefore he cut them off, to make room for other instruments. We perceive this clearly by comparing these prophecies with the records of their accomplishment: and we shall see it as evident in the case of others, as in that of Alexander, if we steadily exercise our faith on the word of God, and judge of every event by that rule.

CHAP. IX.

Daniel, being assured that the end of the captivity was near, humbles himself in confessing his sins and those of his people, and earnestly prays for the restoration of Jerusalem, 1—19. Gabriel informs him that the city, being rebuilt, shall continue for seventy weeks of years; when the Messiah, being cut off for the sins of his people, and the covenant confirmed with many; the legal sacrifices would be terminated, and desolating judgments overwhelm both the city and nation, 20—27.

stead, to keep the nations in perpetual turmoil, and to drench the earth with the blood of its inhabitants. This is an abstract of the history of mankind: nor have the pleasant lands, where the light of heavenly truth hath most shined, escaped their share of these desolations. They that fill the earth with war are commonly disposed to vex the Church with persecution; and they often do not think themselves mighty in power, till they have declared war against the armies of the living God, and trampled down those who were burning and shining lights on earth, and who shall shine as stars in the kingdom of God for ever. Whether they intend it, or not, yet they magnify themselves against the King of kings, the Prince of the holy army of martyrs, when they persecute his people. They may indeed so far prevail, as to put a stop to the public preaching of the gospel and administration of divine ordinances; they may silence the ministers and trample on the truths and sanctuary of Christ; they may destroy wonderfully the mighty and holy people of God; they may unite fierceness with policy and power, and practise and prosper; yet their successes will have an appointed period: when the hypocrites are detected, or cut off, and the believers are sufficiently proved and purified, or taken home, they will be broken without hand. Many, that for a time have had power given them for these purposes, have thus run their course, and have perished miserably in their sins. The two thousand and three hundred days will soon expire, when every enemy shall be destroyed, and the sanctuary be cleansed; when the time of the indignation shall come to an end, and the Church's tears shall terminate in joy and praise.

V. 15—27.

Whilst some things are exceedingly plain in these prophecies, for our conviction, let us remember that difficulties are left in others, among other reasons, to be a touchstone of our modesty and sincerity. If we humbly desire to understand the meaning of them, our great Prophet will lead us into it as far as is good for us: but we may be thankful to be taught by the instrumentality of men, and by the silent teaching of the Holy Spirit: for the glory even of angels, if they were to appear to us sinful worms of the earth, would scarcely be supportable, and the best of us should need much encouragement to endure their visible presence, or to hear their kindest words; so great

But amidst all our doubts and discouragements, on our own account, or that of the Gospel, we may, if true believers, look forward with a cheerful hope of a happy event; and we should thus endeavour to compose our minds for attending on the business, to which we are severally appointed, in the Church and in the world.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. Darius. This is the same person who is called Cyaxares the son of Astyages by the heathen historians. Astyages had the name of Ahasuerus among the Jews, as appears by a passage in Tobit, (xiv. 15.) where the taking of Nineveh is ascribed to Nebuchadanosor and Assucrus, who were the same with Nabupollazar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, and Astyages; (Lowth.)

V. 2, 3. It is probable that Daniel received the answer to his prayer, which is recorded in this chapter, a short time before he was cast into the den of lions; and it was an excellent introduction to that trial of his faith and piety.—He learned from the books of the prophets, especially from the writings of Jeremiah, that the desolations of Jerusalem would continue seventy years, which he understood were drawing to a conclusion. (Marg. Ref.) 'We may observe from hence, that the prophets studied the writings of those prophets who were before them, for the more perfect understanding of the times when their prophecies were to be fulfilled.' (Lowth.) These seventy years were dated from the latter end of the third, or beginning of the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Daniel was carried captive, and this was the sixty-ninth of them.—The prophet was much above eighty years of age at this time, and chief President of the whole kingdom: yet he diligently set himself to seek from God, by prayer and fasting, with every token of sorrow, humiliation, and self-denial, the performance of his promised mercy to his afflicted people, and his future blessings upon them. He had his regular hours of prayer three times a day, and we may be sure that he did not forget the people on those occasions; yet he regarded it as a duty incumbent on him to set apart stated seasons for mortification and devotion, in the distressed state of his people and the church of God! 4 And I prayed unto the Lord my God, and made my confession, and said, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments;

5 We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts, and from thy judgments:

6 Neither have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land.

7 O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee.

8 O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face; to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, and to all the people of the land.

to our fathers; because we have sinned against thee.

9 To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him;

10 Neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets.

11 Yea, all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him.

12 And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil: for under the whole heaven hath not been done, as hath been done upon Jerusalem.

13 As it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil is come upon us: yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth.

been covered with confusion of face, as true penitents, and the rest would inherit everlasting shame and contempt, (xii. 2. Marg. Ref.)

Set before us, &c. Or, "Pleced before our faces." The plain instructions and pressing exhortations of the prophets are thus described, in order to aggravate the guilt of those who, notwithstanding, persisted in rebellion.

V. 11. (Marg. Ref.)
 V. 12. (Marg. Ref.) The destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the condition of the Jews during almost eighteen centuries, have far more exceeded all the miseries of the Babylonish captivity, than those miseries exceeded the judgments inflicted on other nations: and is it not then evident, that the guilt of crucifying the Messiah, and rejecting his Gospel, was immensely more atrocious, than all their previous transgressions? (Note, 25—27.)

V. 13. As it, &c. A devout acknowledgment of God's justice, in making his judgments exactly fulfil the threatenings denounced many ages ago by Moses. (Louth.) Thus every succeeding part of the sacred writings attests and proves the divine authority of those parts which preceded. The history relates the fulfilment of former predictions; and then new prophecies are added, which future events accomplish. (Is. xliii. 9.)

Yd, &c. Few, comparatively, of the Jews humbly prayed for deliverance from their troubles, as expecting it from the power and mercy of God: and some, who prayed to him for help in affliction, did not seek for his converting

V. 4. We may suppose that Daniel enlarged very much on these particulars, in his copious supplications, of which he hath given us a compendium. In these he first confessed the sins of himself and his people, and professed his belief of the terrible greatness and power of Israel's God, and his covenanted mercy and favour to those who loved him and kept his commandments; for others were only nominal Israelites, who had forfeited their privileges by their crimes, and by impentence and unbelief. (Marg. Ref.) 'The better men are, the greater is the sense of their guilt, and the deeper their humiliation.' (Louth.)

V. 5, 6. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. 'He showeth, that whensoever God punisheth, he doeth it for just cause; and thus the godly never accuse him of rigour, as the wicked do; but acknowledge that in themselves there is just cause why he should so 'entreat them.' But Daniel also recollected, that abundant mercies and forgivenesses, as well as perfect justice, belonged to God: so that even the rebellious might hope in him, when brought to a sense of their guilt and danger.—The Kings of Judah and Israel were dead, and there were at that time no inhabitants of Judah or Jerusalem; but the prophet considers not only the generation of Israel then living, but also the several orders of men, who, in former ages, had provoked God to pour out vengeance on the nation. He shows that the whole blame lay on them, and that they had all acted a most shameful part. Some had who all agree in the great outlines. It is universally allowed, that the seventy weeks, here mentioned, mean seventy weeks of years, or what would be equivalent to seventy returns of the sabbatical year; that is, four hundred and ninety years. This period was determined, or decided on; and during this term the Jews would enjoy the peculiar privileges of God's people; and Jerusalem, being rebuilt, would retain the name of the holy city; but about the expiration of these years, a sacrifice would be offered, making effectual atonement for sin, superseding the necessity of the repeated legal sacrifices and sin-offerings; as well as for the reconciliation and sanctification of the true people of God: an everlasting righteousness would also be introduced, for the complete justification of every believer; the time allotted for the law and the prophets would expire; the kingdom of God would be preached; and all the visions and prophecies of the Scriptures concerning Christ would receive their accomplishment, in this Holy One of God being anointed by the Holy Ghost, and in all respects perfected and exalted as the Messiah. —The marginal readings vary, in some respects, from the translation; but they do not appear materially to affect the meaning. The word rendered prophecy, is prophet: and may be understood of Christ, the great Prophet of the Church, being openly preached to mankind in this character. Most Holy, is literally "Holy of holies," an expression which usually signifies the inner sanctuary; and it is very properly applied to the Messiah, who was greater than the temple, (Matt. xii. 6;) because in him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, (Col. ii. 9;) whereupon he calls his body "the temple." (John ii. 21.) (Lenth.)

V. 25—27. The former verse gives a general view of the subject, but these are more particular. The prophet was called on to observe and understand, that "from the going forth of the commandment to restore Jerusalem, unto the Messiah, would be seven weeks, and sixty-two weeks;" during the seven weeks the streets and walls of the city would be rebuilt, amidst much oppo-o'clock in the afternoon; (about which hour Christ our Sacrifice expired.) Probably Daniel had spent all the former part of the day in fasting, and prayer, and religious exercises, and was about to conclude for the present: but whilst he was thus earnestly engaged, the angel touched him, and excited his attention; informing him that he was commissioned to instruct him in the most important matters, connected with the subject of his prayers: for he had no sooner begun to pray, than the Lord commanded him to come to him; as he was a man greatly beloved, a special favourite of heaven, even one in whom the Lord greatly delighted. Therefore he would understand the plan of Providence, and be enabled to consider the vision in a satisfactory manner. It is probable that Daniel had prayed not only for the restoration of the Jews from captivity, and the rebuilding of the city and temple; but also that they might be preserved from those sins which had brought the calamities upon them; for the continuance of God's favour to them; and for all the blessings which were expected from the coming of the promised Messiah: and the following vision was an answer to these prayers and desires of his heart. "Learned men have observed a near affinity between the prophecy of Daniel and the Revelation of St. John: and we may take notice, that much the same title is given to both." Daniel is styled "a man greatly beloved; and John, "the disciple whom Jesus loved." (John xxi. 20—24.) (Lenth.)

V. 24. We have in this and the following verses one of the most undeniable prophecies of Christ, and of his coming and salvation, that is found in the whole Old Testament: and they contain the true reason why the Jews hesitate to call Daniel a prophet; as this prediction demonstrates that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and that they are guilty of the most obstinate unbelief, in expecting another Messiah so many centuries after the time fixed for his coming, and after the actual accomplishment of the other parts of the same prophecy. There are, however, difficulties in expounding the passage, which have occasioned a variety of opinions among commentators,

Daniel, after long mourning and fasting, sition, and in very turbulent times: and after the expiration of the sixty-two weeks, (making sixty-nine in all,) or in the seventieth week, the Messiah would be cut off by a violent death, but not for any offence of his own: (Marg. Ref.) and then the people of a prince that should come would destroy both Jerusalem and the temple, and bear down all before them like a deluge of waters: for unto the end of that war desolations of the most dreadful kind were determined upon. But before this, the Messiah, ("the Messenger of the Covenant," who was to be "given as a Covenant to the people.") would "confirm the Covenant with many for one week;" the last week of the seventy, whether ending at the death of Christ, as some compute, and extending to two or three years after that event. For, by his own personal ministry, and afterwards by that of his apostles, multitudes of the Jews would accede to the new covenant mediated by him, and way would be made for the calling of the Gentiles also. And his sacrifice of himself, offered during this week, (perhaps towards the middle of it,) would virtually terminate the Mosaic dispensation, and vacate the ceremonial law: so that all other sacrifices and oblations would thenceforth be in every respect inefficacious. (Heb. x. 26.) But the Jewish nation in general, adhering to these sacrifices, and scornfully rejecting that of the Messiah, would in consequence see the idolatrous standards of hostile invaders, (which they justly counted an *abominati*o*n* appear in the land and about Jerusalem; as a token of the desolations which were about to overspread the whole city and country, and to pursue the devoted inhabitants, till all the vengeance which had been determined and predicted had been poured out upon them: and by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the sacrifices there offered would actually be caused to cease. This seems a general outline of the events here foretold; and historical records sufficiently show its general accomplishment, though some difficulty in subordinate matters should still remain.— There are four edicts, recorded in Scripture, to which these words, ("the going forth of the commandment, &c.") may seem applicable: viz. the edict in the first year of Cyrus, (Ezra i. 1;) in the second of Darius, (Ezra vi. 1. Hag. i. 1;) in the seventh of Artaxerxes, (Ezra vii. 7;) and in the twentieth, (Neh. i. ii.)—There are some things in the prediction which, when duly adverted to, give good ground for passing by the two first edicts. And as to the two last, it has been well observed, that Christ's death happened seventy weeks of solar years after one of them, and as many weeks of lunar years after the other. The two first edicts speak only about the rebuilding of the temple,—without one word about rebuilding the city: whereas the prediction speaks about an edict for rebuilding the city and the walls and streets of it, without one word about rebuilding the temple; though in foretelling the second destruction of the city, that of the temple is also mentioned.— But the third edict, that of the seventh of Artaxerxes, though it does not contain the very expressions of Daniel's *has a vision, the glory of which overp*ers in 1—9. An angel comforts and strengthens him; and noticing the prediction, yet it contains things to which these expressions are applicable. Sir Isaac Newton justly observes, that the dispersed Jews became a people and a city, when they returned into a body politic; and that was in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus; when Ezra, by the king's commission, created magistrates all over the land, to govern the people according to the law of God and of the king: under Ezra they first became a polity or city by a government of their own.— But there is another character, which is perhaps yet more decisive. According to the prediction, the edict must be only seven weeks before completing the building of the city: for one and the same event, viz. the appearance of the Messiah, which is placed only sixty-two weeks after the building, is placed only sixty-nine after the edict: which demonstrates, that the distance between the edict and the building could be no more than seven weeks. Now the two first edicts were made long before; for in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, (above eighty years after the latest of those edicts,) it was told Nehemiah, that the wall was broken down, the gates burnt with fire, and the place of his father's sepulchres lay waste.' (Maclaurin.) The date of the going forth of the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem cannot therefore be reckoned from the time of Cyrus's decree, or that of Darius. It is generally fixed to the commission granted to Ezra by Artaxerxes in the seventh year of his reign; though some prefer the commission granted to Nehemiah by the same prince, in his twentieth year, and so reckon the years by the shorter computation. But the former seems more satisfactory, and is only objected to, because Nehemiah's commission especially related to the rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem; whereas Ezra's was of a more general nature. But the expressions here used may be understood figuratively, of re-settling the whole Jewish constitution in Church and state, which Ezra began and Nehemiah carried on or finished; as well as of rebuilding and fortifying the city. (Marg. Ref.) The most eminent chronologers compute it to have been nearly four hundred and ninety years, from the commission granted to Ezra to the death of Christ; and some contend that it was so with the greatest exactness. This period was divided into three subordinate ones. During seven weeks, or forty-nine years, the street and wall, or rampart, were to be *build*ed in troublous times. This takes in the space that intervened between the granting of Ezra's commission and the completion of Nehemiah's work, as recorded in the last chapter of his book, and which contains the last history in the Old Testament, or perhaps some time longer. From the return of the Jews, in virtue of Cyrus's decree, till the days of Artaxerxes Longimanus, (though the temple had been rebuilt, and some parts of the city;) the affairs of the Jews continued in great disorder, both as to the state of the city, and the regulation of their civil and religious concerns. From Ezra's commission, however, they began to assume a more promising aspect; and notwithstanding the troubles excited by various enemies, matters were at length brought into better order, both as to the temple and its worship, and as to the police and defence of the city; and the state was guarded with wholesome laws impartially executed. These things were accomplished in very troublesome times, as the histories of Ezra and Nehemiah show: but afterwards the nation became populous and powerful, and Jerusalem very strong and almost impregnable. These were the events that occurred in the first seven weeks: and from the expiration of that term to the beginning of the Gospel by the ministry of John the Baptist, as some compute, or to that of our Lord, was four hundred and thirty-four years, or sixty-two weeks: and the last week, or seven years, is allotted to the ministry of John and of Christ himself, until his crucifixion: for he was to be cut off after the seven and the sixty-two weeks, or in the seventieth week: but as it is said, that in the midst or in the half part of the week he would cause the sacrifice to cease; some conclude, that the last week extended beyond his crucifixion, to the time when the Gospel began to be preached to the Gentiles also. We cannot, however, be absolutely certain in respect of minute calculations: but whether before, or just after, the death of Christ, every thing was done within this last week, or seven years, which was requisite for introducing the Gospel-dispensation, for confirming the new covenant of grace, and for the calling of multitudes to partake of its blessings. The legal sacrifices then lost their obligation and efficacy; the condemnation of the Jewish nation was denounced and ratified by Christ himself; and preparation was soon made for its execution, though it was not fully completed till about forty years afterwards: these intermediate years being like the time which intervenes between the condemnation and the execution of a malefactor. Those insurrections, however, soon began, which induced the Romans to make war upon the Jews. Then their armies under Vespasian and Titus erected their idolatrous standards in the holy land, and surrounded Jerusalem; the city was besieged, taken, and desolated, and left to be trodden down by the Gentiles; immense multitudes perished miserably; the temple was destroyed by the soldiers, contrary to the orders of the general: the remnant of the Jews were dispersed through all nations; and those judgments were poured as an irresistible deluge on that people, which have continued to this day. Thus the general interpretation is plain, notwithstanding some difficulties. 'It is very useful to observe, that (supposing all these things to be real causes of some kind of obscurity; namely, of that obscurity which is impenetrable by superficial attention, but is consistent with convincing evidence upon due search);—the veil of apparent obscurity, which distinguishes prophecy from history, is a proof of wise contrivance;—seeing, what on first view increases the obscurity, on due inquiry, increases the evidence, and determines the meaning of the prediction.' (Declarum.) Indeed, inattention to the words of the prophecy itself has been the chief cause of those differences of opinion which prevail in explaining it; it contains internal characters, which carefully noted fix the time of its accomplishment very satisfactorily. It is, however, undeniable, that Daniel foretold, that the Messiah would come within less than five hundred years from a decree granted for rebuilding Jerusalem; he showed that he would be put to death, by a legal sentence, (for so the word implies) and he expressly predicted, that, in consequence, Jerusalem and the temple would be desolated, and the nation of the Jews exposed to tremendous punishments, of which no termination is mentioned. Within that time, Jesus of Nazareth appeared; he answered in every respect to the description given of him by all the prophets: he was put to death as a deceiver; yet vast multitudes became his disciples, and Christianity gained a permanent establishment. After a time Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed; and the state of the Jews to this day is a striking comment on this prediction. How can it then be denied, that Daniel spake by divine inspiration? or that Jesus is the promised Messiah? Both these important points might be fully demonstrated by this one prophecy, even if it stood single: how much more, when it is only one star, so to speak, in a resplendent constellation; or one among a vast number of predictions, all of which combine with united evidence to demonstrate the same grand truths! (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

They who are most eminent in wisdom and piety, and favoured with most frequent communications from heaven, will pay the greatest reverence to the written word of God: and only spiritual pride or enthusiasm render men regardless of this sacred standard, because of superior knowledge or supposed new revelations; for the genuine spirit of prophecy would have a contrary effect. The most exalted in rank, and they that are most occupied in important employments, should spare time for the study of the Scriptures and prayer. The promises of God are intended to encourage our petitions for their accomplishment. No personal ease or prosperity can render the believer regardless of the desolations, or indifferent about the prosperity, of Zion: and no constancy in stated exercises of devotion, should prevent us from sometimes setting apart extraordinary seasons for prayer and fasting; that we may more deeply humble ourselves before God for our sins and those of our people; and with more earnest and undivided attention seek his blessing on our undertakings and on his cause. Nor will the aged believer, if growing in grace and not prevented by bodily infirmities, wish to excuse himself from these self-denying and humiliating duties.—Our addresses to the Lord our God should always be attended with humble confessions of our own unworthiness, and reverential awe of his holy, great, and terrible majesty; even whilst we plead before him, as "the God who keepeth covenant and mercy with his people." Love to him, shown by obeying his commandments, is the proper evidence that we are interested in these blessings; nor can they who live in sin, and are conscious that they have committed iniquity, and done wickedly, and rebelled in departing from his precepts, take comfort from his covenant and mercy; till they repent and seek forgiveness, and have their hearts thus influenced to love and obey him. But such as freely confess their sins, and labour for language to express their sense of the malignity and multitude of their transgressions, give a hopeful evidence that they are prepared for returning peace, and for a gracious answer to all their supplications. No rank or order of men in the community is free from blame, in respect of the accumulation of national guilt: and if kings or princes refuse to hearken to the faithful ministers of God, they render the mercy of God, in thus warning them, an occasion of deeper guilt and condemnation. In all our sufferings we should acknowledge the justice of the Lord, and that he is glorious even in our punishment; and that shame and confusion of face are our portion, as we have sinned away our mercies and exposed ourselves to his severe rebuke. Yet we must not yield to despondency: for "to the Lord" belong mercies, and forgivenesses, though we have "rebelled against him;" nay, his pardoning grace is vaster than all our crimes. He will indeed execute his threatened judgments on guilty nations, and pour out his curse on impenitent sinners, according as it is written in the book of the law: he will thus establish his word, that he hath spoken against the wicked, in bringing a great evil upon them, even far greater than befel Jerusalem: and so long as men neglect prayer, or do not pray to be turned from their iniquities, and to be made to understand the truth of God, he will watch upon the evil to bring it upon them, being "righteous in all his works." Yet he is ever ready to deliver those who humble themselves before him and call upon him, and to exert that power that he so gloriously displayed, when he brought Israel out of Egypt. When we humbly confess our sins, and plead his promises, and beseech him, for the honour of his name and the credit of his cause, to help and deliver us, that Jerusalem may not become a reproach, we may confidently expect in due time an answer of peace: and we never pray more acceptably, than when we are satisfied about our own concerns, and earnestly entreat our God and Father to cause his face to shine on his sanctuary, for the sake of Christ "the Lord our Righteousness;" and when we present our supplications before him, not for our righteousness, but for his great mercies.

V. 20—27.

The fervent and importunate cries of zealous Christians are well pleasing to the Lord: he will forgive, and hearken, and do: whilst they are speaking he is preparing an answer; and all his angels, though invisible, are his ministering spirits to convey blessings to the heirs of salvation. They fly swiftly to execute every one of his commands; but they especially delight in performing kind services to praying souls; who, being accepted in Christ, are "greedy" beloved," in proportion to the degree in which they resemble him and seek his glory. The Lord gives skill and understanding in answer to prayer, and they who well consider his words shall receive instruction, in every thing which concerns them. All blessings bestowed on sinners centre in Christ, and come to them through his all-sufficient atoning sacrifice: and the most eminent believers need frequently to be reminded to look off from forms, and types, and shadows, and outward privileges, unto the anointed Holy One, who was cut off by an ignominious execruting death, "suffering once for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God." Thus he finished whatever the types prefigured, the prophets foretold, or the justice of God and the honour of the law required, in order to the pardoning and subduing our transgressions, the atoning for our iniquity, our reconciliation to God, our everlasting righteousness and sanctification. Here is the foundation of our hope, our Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness, our Way of access to the throne of grace, and our entrance into heaven. This seals the sum of prophecy, and confirms the covenant with many: and whilst we rejoice in the blessings of salvation, we should remember the groans which the purchase of them cost our Redeemer. But "how shall they escape who neglect so great salvation?" The desolations of Jerusalem, and the slaughter or long-continued dispersion of the Jews, by the overspreading of abomination; and the pouring out of divine vengeance on the murderers of Christ, not only evince the truth of the Scriptures, but loudly warn others not to copy so fatal an example.—When the Lord commands, the city will be builded, and its prosperity secured, even in turbulent times; and at his word desolations rush in like a flood, from which no outward privileges can defend us: but the streets and walls of the true Jerusalem, which hath been so long building in troublesome times, will at length be completed by the ruin of every adversary; and "peace will be within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces." Let us pray for this peace of Jerusalem, for they shall prosper that love her.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. This chapter begins Daniel's last vision, which was about four years after the preceding one. It is continued to the end of the book: and as the things revealed would certainly take place, so the time would be long before they would all be accomplished. To the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, of whom exclusively many interpret the latter part of the vision, was no more than three hundred and seventy years; and Daniel had predicted events vastly more remote: but on another interpretation, which is supported by the highest authorities, and by the most conclusive reasonings, it will appear that many of them are not yet accomplished, and indeed that they look forward almost to the end of time: and thus Daniel himself seems to have understood them. "And he understood the matter, and obtained knowledge of it by the vision." Thus the concluding words may be literally rendered; he acquired much knowledge of these events, in addition to what he had before, by this vision; though some things still remained obscure to him. (xii. 8.)

V. 2, 3. Daniel had been at this time seventy-three years in captivity; and could not be less than ninety years of age; yet he spent three weeks, in mournfully humbling himself before God. It is probable, that he was much affected at witnessing the backwardness of the Jews, to avail themselves of Cyrus's proclamation; perhaps fearing, lest his example, in serving the king of Persia, should be misunderstood by them. He doubtless would hear from time to time discouraging accounts of the difficulties, which his brethren in Judea had to encounter: and many think, that machinations were then carrying on against them in the Persian court, which might throw still greater obstacles and discouragements in their way. (Notes, Ezra iv.) But, whatever induced him thus to observe so long a season of fasting and prayer, he abstained, during the whole time, from all relishing food, and from wine, subsisting on bread and vegetables, drinking only water, and avoiding the use of those ointments and other indulgences, which his station and time of life seemed to render necessary. (i. 3-16.)—This was very different from those fasts of later ages, in which men indeed abstain from flesh, but eat other delicacies, and drink strong liquors without restraint.

V. 4-9. Part of the time of Daniel's fasting must have coincided with the season appointed for the passover and the feast of unleavened bread: but the passover could not be observed in any other place than Jerusalem; and the distressed state of the nation rendered fasting peculiarly proper at that time. Hiddekel, or Tigris, (Gen. ii. 14.) was near Shusan, where, it is probable, Daniel at that time resided. Whilst he walked on the banks of that river, for contemplation or devotion, with attendants at a distance, he lifted up his eyes and saw one in the form of a man, who could be no other than the Son of God.—The description St. John gives of Christ, as High Priest of the Church. (Rev. i. 12-20.) seems to be taken from this place of Daniel; which proves that the person here described can be no other than the Son of God, which may be further confirmed by comparing the person described here, and xii. 5, 6, with Rev. x. 2-6; who is there represented as setting his right foot on the sea, and his left upon the land, as Sovereign Lord of both elements. (Lowth.) His priestly garment of linen was an emblem of his purity, and the equity of his administration, and the excellency of his mediatorial work. His girdle, of the finest gold, might denote his faithfulness to his word, and readiness to perform all things which he had undertaken, for his Church: his body like the beryl, might signify his heavenly beauty and excellency; his face as lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, might show the terror of his frown, and his discernment and knowledge of all hearts and all events: his arms and feet as polished brass, might imply his glorious power, as engaged to defend and support his people, and to tread down their enemies: and the voice of his words, like the voice of a multitude, might signify the extensive efficacy of his word to save or to destroy. Daniel alone saw the vision of this glorious Person; for his attendants were so alarmed, that they fled to hide themselves; and even he was so overwhelmed by it, as to be deprived of strength and courage; and his countenance was changed to a pallid and ghastly hue, like that of a corpse. Yet was he not wholly incapacitated for hearing the words of the Lord; though he lay prostrate on the ground in humble adoration of his glorious majesty, his senses and faculties being closed from all other objects, as in a deep sleep. V. 10—14. Whilst Daniel lay prostrate, a hand touched him: this seems to have been a created angel. (and not the Son of God: and the prophet was lifted upon his knees and hands, that he might attend to the vision. The angel encouraged him as before. (ix. 23.) by assuring him, that he was peculiarly dear to the Lord: and called on him to understand or attend to what he had to speak, and to stand up for that purpose, as he was sent to give him important information. Thus excited, Daniel arose, and stood trembling; and the angel proceeded to encourage him to lay aside his terrors, for which he had no cause: for since the first day that he set his heart to understand the causes of his people's calamities, and what would be the event of them, and to chasten, or rather humble, himself by fasting and mortification, his prayers were heard, and the angel was now come to him on that account. But he had been employed, during the three weeks of Daniel's fasting and prayer, in warding off the mischief, that was rising against his people in the Persian court. The prince of the kingdom of Persia cannot mean Cyrus, who was friendly to the Jews: but his son Cambyses, who managed affairs in his father's absence upon some expedition, and who was set against the Jews by their enemies, might be intended; and the angel had been so long watching over his designs, in order to defeat them. But many think an evil angel was meant, who presided under "the god of this world," over that department, to watch his opportunity of doing mischief to the Church. Some indeed explain it, of the guardian-angel, intrusted with the care of Persia: but it is palpably absurd to suppose one holy angel set to oppose another holy angel: and indeed the interpretation, which introduces presiding angels, holy, or unholy, seems to have little scriptural ground to rest on. The angel, however, who spake to

Daniel, was detained all this time, to defeat the machinations of the enemies of Israel; and yet could not have prevailed, but that Michael, one of the chief princes, (whom many think to denote Christ.) came to his assistance, (Marg. Ref.) while employed to watch the measures of the Persian rulers: but he was at that time sent to make known to Daniel what would befall his people in future ages and in the latter days.

V. 15—19. This angel, that was helped by Michael, appeared so glorious to Daniel, that he was astonished and struck dumb by what he saw and heard: but one like to a man touched his lips, and then he was enabled to speak; and he complained, that, instead of deriving comfort from the vision, his sorrows were renewed by it, and he was utterly overcome; for how could the poor servant endure to speak with his glorious Lord? so that it was no wonder that he was left fainting and breathless. Again therefore one touched him, in appearance as a man; and communicated strength to him: and then the prophet was enabled to hear the words which he spake to him.

How can, &c. "How can the servant of this my Lord talk with that my Lord?" that is, with so majestic a person, at whose sight I was perfectly confounded. (Louth.) This supposes, at least with probability, that the angel mentioned in the preceding verses is here meant; not that glorious Person before described, but an angel deputed by him.

O man, &c. "Thou needest not be under such terrible apprehensions, as if this vision did portend thee some mischief: for it is a peculiar token of God's favour to thee." (Louth.)

V. 20, 21. The angel next inquired whether Daniel well understood for what purpose he came to him? Thus reminding him, that he was sent to instruct him concerning the things which would befall his people: but when he had executed this commission he would return back, and continue to counteract the devices of the Persian kings against the Jews, even till that monarchy should terminate; by which means many fatal effects would be prevented, and many troubles averted. And when that commission was executed, the prince of Grecia would come; or the Macedonian empire under Alexander and his successors would be established, and the chief danger and trouble to the Jews would arise from that quarter. But he would proceed more fully to open, and enlarge upon, the prophecies of the former Scriptures to the same effect; or rather to show what was written in the book of God's secret purposes, of which all prophecies are as an abstract. 'God's decrees are spoken of, as if they were committed to writing, and registered in a book' (Lev. th.) But Daniel might be assured, that he had not one friend in the court of Persia, who would concur with the angel, to forward the prophet's designs in behalf of his people, but Michael their Prince: and that he must depend on him alone to disappoint the devices which were forming against them.

This forms the introduction to the prophecies in the next chapters, which were not proposed as emblems, but in plain language. A great deal is advanced by respectable expositors on these verses, about tutelary and guardian angels presiding over different countries, as if they strove one against another, each for his favourite country. This may indeed consist with either paganism or popery, but it is utterly incompatible with Christianity. The passage is allowed to be difficult: but perhaps careful consideration may allow the interpretation above given to be satisfactory. Daniel was chief president in Persia: yet not one of the princes or counsellors of that empire cordially united with him in doing good to the Jews: he must therefore look above to Michael their Prince, and his mighty angels, who would at length effect a revolution, by turning the dominion from Persia to Greece, which would be more favourable to the Jews, than Persia in after-times was.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

This world will continue to be a vale of tears to the greatest and best of men, as long as they live in it: for when they are most exempted from personal trials, they often see most cause to mourn over the calamities of the Church, and the sins which occasion them. When we duly lay these things to heart, and diligently seek to understand wherefore God contendeth with us or his people, and, as conscientiously guilty, afflict and humble ourselves by self-denial in things lawful, disrelishing earthly comforts, while such important concerns engross our attention, we may expect peculiar answers to our prayers. The more we delight in communion with God, the less we shall be attached to the pleasures of sense, and the more willing we shall be to forego them, that we may be at liberty for nobler joys. They who accustom themselves in youth to self-denial, will find it less grievous when they grow old: and in all cases, fasting, temperance, meditation and prayer, are happy means of obtaining discoveries of the glory of Christ to our souls. But we are better fitted to receive these discoveries by faith, than to behold with our bodily eyes the refulgence of his personal and mediatorial excellencies: and the secret defence and support of his Providence and Grace are more suited to our state in this world, than the thunder of his power manifested in our behalf, or his majestic word audibly spoken to us. Our frail and vile bodies are not able to support such glorious displays; nor will be, till corruption shall be swallowed up of life: the least intimations of the visions of God would fill us with terror; nor could we behold them (unless supernaturally supported,) without being overwhelmed with astonishment, and even reduced to corruption. We may then be thankful to be spoken to by men like ourselves, and by the small still voice of his teaching and comforting Spirit; and we should learn from these records to adore the unseen glorious Majesty of God our Saviour, and to be humbled under the sense of our meanness and sinfulness; seeing one of the best beloved of our race could not find courage and strength even to converse with a ministering spirit of the world above, in whom he saw such superior excellence and glory. The Lord will, however, support his servants under the discoveries of his Majesty and the sense of their own vileness, and he will prepare them to hear his word: when he hath cast them down, he will again raise them up, and make them know that he hath loved them; and he will gradually turn their trembling and sorrow into holy joy and confidence in him.—When we judge and chasten ourselves before God, we are most likely to escape his chastening. Whilst Satan, and his angels, and various evil counsellors, excite princes to devise mischief against his Church; we may rejoice that Christ our Prince, and all his mighty angels, hold with us in these things, and counteract the machinations of our enemies: but we should not expect that many others will favour us in this evil world, or in the courts of the princes of this world. All things, however, that are written in the Scriptures of truth, will certainly be accomplished, and the whole counsel of God shall be established. Our prayers are often put in a way of being effectually answered, before we have any assurance of their being accepted: let us then not be weary of well-doing, but continue in prayer; and we shall certainly prevail, if we faint not.

tending the affairs of Persia, he adds, that in the first year of Darius, (when perhaps it was debated whether the Jews should be freed or not) he was employed to confirm and establish him in his favourable dispositions. This measure was then in contemplation, but it was not determined on till after the death of Darius, and the succession of Cyrus.

V. 2--4. 'I will show thee the succession of the Persian and Grecian empire, in plain naked truth, not in symbolical or figurative representations, as it was showed before.' (Louth.) 'The memorable events, which were revealed to Daniel in the vision of the ram and the he-goat, are here again more clearly and explicitly revealed, in his last vision, by an angel: so that this latter prophecy may not improperly be said to be a comment and explanation of the former.' (Bp. Newton.) --The three kings of Persia, here mentioned, were Cambyses the son of Cyrus, Smerdis the Magian, who falsely pretended to be another of his sons, and Darius Hystaspis, who married Cyrus's daughter. Xerxes, the son of this Darius, was the fourth king in Persia after Cyrus, who having inherited, or acquired, immense riches beyond conception, stirred up all his subjects and allies to invade Greece. For this expedition he collected the largest army that is read of in history, consisting of all sorts, of more than five millions of men; besides the Carthaginians, and others, whom he excited to war against the Grecians in other quarters. But though this tremendous invasion exceedingly wasted Greece; yet it was resisted by a very small number of the inhabitants, with the most determined valour, and the most decided success. The Persian troops were shamefully routed and dispersed, incredible numbers perished, and Xerxes returned home in disgrace, and almost unattended. This was one of the most memorable expeditions recorded in history: and it gave rise to those long wars and that inveterate hatred, betwixt the Grecians and Persians, which ended in the subversion of the Persian empire by Alexander. So that the prophecy, touching upon the principal events, passes over the nine subsequent Persian kings to the time of Alexander, as less worthy of notice; and contrasts his successful expedition against Persia with Xerxes's unsuccessful invasion of Greece. Alexander is here called "a mighty king, that should "stand up, and rule with great dominion, and do according to his will;" which implies not only his extensive conquests and absolute authority, but his capricious tyranny, which cost some of his most faithful followers their lives, when they ventured to oppose his inclinations. But when he had acquired the summit of success, power, and renown, he was suddenly cut off, as we have seen; and his dominions were divided into four parts, not to his posterity, but his captains: and that did not equal the honour of his kingdom; which was thus plucked up, for the benefit of others, and not of his own family. The natural brother and the sons, with the mother and wife, of Alexander, in about fifteen years, perished, chiefly by treachery and murder; and then no remains of his family were left: and his captains, after many destructive wars, were all destroyed or reduced, except four, who became heads of four subordinate kingdoms. Cassander reigned in Greece and the west, Lysimachus in Thrace and the north, Ptolemy in Egypt and the south, and Seleucus in Syria and the east.' (Bp. Newton.) (Note, vii. 5.)

V. 5. Though the dominions of Alexander were divided into four parts; yet two of these kings soon became more eminent than the others, and often seized upon a great part of their dominions: namely, the kings of Egypt and of Syria, called in this prophecy the kings of the south and of the north, as Egypt lay to the south and Syria to the north of Judea. These two kingdoms alone are noticed in what follows: because Judea lay betwixt them, and was affected by all their contests and transactions. This verse is rather obscure: it is, however, generally allowed to mean, that Ptolemy Lagus king of Egypt would soon become powerful, as one of Alexander's princes: but that another of them, (even Seleucus Nicator king of Syria,) would be strong above him; for he was the conqueror of the conquerors, and gained the ascendancy over them, engrossed a vast proportion of Alexander's dominions, and outlived all his competitors.

V. 6. Antiochus Soter succeeded Seleucus, and was succeeded by Antiochus Theus, in the kingdom of Syria: and Ptolemy Philadelphus reigned in Egypt after his father Ptolemy Lagus. During this time, there were frequent wars between these neighbouring and rival monarches

But at length they entered into a treaty of peace ; to confirm which Antiochus agreed to put away his wife Laodice with her sons, and to marry Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy. Thus the daughter of the king of the south came to the king of the north, to make an agreement with him, and brought with her an immense dowry : but she could not retain the power of the arm, the interest that she had acquired : for Antiochus recalled Laodice, and put away Berenice ; and Laodice fearing another change poisoned her husband, and caused Berenice to be murdered, with her attendants. So that Antiochus himself could not stand his ground, or retain his power ; and Berenice was delivered to destruction, and those that brought her, and he "whom she had brought forth," or her son, (for so the words are generally rendered :) nor was her father able to defend her, for he died about the same time. Such were the consequences of this disastrous marriage and alliance.

V. 7—9. Ptolemy Evergetes, brother to Berenice, a branch out of the same root, standing up in his father's estate, came with a great army to avenge his sister's death on Seleucus Callinicus, son of Laodice, who had succeeded to the throne of Syria. And he entered forcibly into the fortresses, or provinces of that kingdom, and easily prevailed against Seleucus. So that, when a sedition in Egypt recalled him home, he carried away with him many captives ; and not only the nobles, but the gods, of Syria were thus brought into Egypt. It is said that he took home with him no less than two thousand five hundred idols ; among which were some that Cambyzes had formerly carried out of Egypt : and for this service the superstitious Egyptians honoured him with the title of Euergetes, or the Benefactor. With these captive princes and images, he also carried off vast treasures ; and having avenged himself on Seleucus, he continued more years than he, surviving him four or five years, and remaining unmolested in his own kingdom.

V. 10—12. Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great, the sons of Seleucus Callinicus, were stirred up to war against the king of Egypt, in hopes of recovering the territories which had been taken from their father. But Ceraunus was poisoned by one of his discontented captains ; and Antiochus was left to pursue the war alone. This circumstance was marked in the prophecy ; for after mention had been made of "his sons," it is added, "He," or one of them, shall certainly come, &c. Ptolemy Philopater had succeeded Euergetes his father in the Kingdom of Egypt, before these events took place : and Antiochus made war upon him, over-ran the countries that he held in Asia, and spread desolations like a flood wherever he passed through. Then making a truce with Ptolemy, during which both parties treated of peace and prepared for war, Antiochus returned to attack Ptolemy's forces, and overcame them, and carried the war even to the borders of Egypt, which he threatened with an invasion. This exceedingly exasperated Ptolemy, who marched against him with a great army, gave him battle, entirely defeated Antiochus' numerous forces, obliged him to retreat to Antioch, and thence to send ambassadors to treat of peace. But Ptolemy did not pursue the advantages of this decisive victory ; for, being elated with his success, he gave himself up to the most shameful debaucheries. After the retreat of Antiochus, he visited the cities of his Asiatic dominions, and Jerusalem among the rest ; and being with difficulty restrained from entering into the holy of holies, he was so displeased with the Jews, that he destroyed, some say, forty thousand, others sixty thousand, of his Jewish subjects in Egypt, by a most furious persecution ; and his casting down so many tens of thousands of his own subjects would of course weaken his kingdom, and conduce to its ruin.

V. 13--16. After some years, Antiochus recovered from the effects of his late defeat: and Ptolemy Philopater being dead, and succeeded by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was only four or five years of age, Antiochus raised a greater army than before, and amassed vast sums of money to defray the expenses of the war, by which he hoped to deprive the minor king of his dominions. And at the same time that Antiochus marched his army to attack the Egyptian provinces, many other enemies stood up against the young king. For the conduct of his father, and of those abandoned ministers who now governed in his name, had so disgusted the Egyptians, that they were ready to join Antiochus; and Philip, king of Macedon, made a league with him against Ptolemy, stipulating to divide his kingdom betwixt them. The persecuted Jews also became refractory, and broke off from their allegiance to the king of Egypt, to join Antiochus; for this seems to be the meaning of the words translated, "the robbers of thy people." These revellers exalted themselves against their former masters, and so helped to establish, or accomplish, this vision, or prophecy: but they were reduced by Ptolemy's forces, who under Scopas gained many advantages against those of Antiochus. However, the presence of that prince turned the scale in his favour; for he soon recovered what Scopas had taken, and besieged and took Zidon, and others of Ptolemy's best fortified cities. So that the king of Egypt could not withstand his arms, even with his choicest troops; but he carried all before him, and succeeded in his designs, and established his authority in the land of Judah, the glorious land of God's chosen people, and of his special presence; which was by him consumed, in furnishing subsistence to his troops: or rather it was by him perfected or established, as some render the word; for it was favoured, and prospered greatly under his government.

V. 17. Antiochus after this success set himself, with all the strength of his kingdom, to get possession of Egypt, being assisted by the Jews, called upright ones, as worshipping JEROUAH, in contradistinction to idolaters: or, as the phrase may mean, making an agreement with him, that is, with Ptolemy: for he attempted to circumvent him by treaty, as well as to subdue him by arms. Thus he endeavoured to accomplish his purpose: and to induce Ptolemy to enter into treaty with him, he gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage; whose singular beauty is supposed to be intimated by the expression, the daughter of women, that is, the most accomplished daughter of women. In this he meant fraudulently, for he thought to corrupt his daughter to betray the interests of her husband; but the project failed: for Ptolemy was aware of the artifice, and kept upon his guard; and Cleopatra preferred the interests of her husband to those of her insidious father, and even joined in an embassy to the Romans, craving protection against him.

V. 18, 19. Antiochus, not being able to execute this project, turned his arms another way, and attacked many of the isles and cities bordering on the Mediterranean sea. (Marg. Act.) This offended the Romans, who deemed themselves insulted by this treatment of their allies: and in their own behalf, to vindicate the honour of their state, they proclaimed war against him; and their generals soon drove him out of Europe, pursued him into Asia, by a most decisive victory deprived him of a great part of his dominions, and compelled him to submit to a very hard and dishonourable peace. Nor did he long survive this disgrace: for finding difficulty in raising the sums of money which the Romans exacted from him, he attempted to plunder a rich temple of Jupiter Belus, in the province of Elymais, where he was slain by the enraged inhabitants. Thus he returned from his rash European expedition to Antioch, his strong-hold, and soon after stumbled, and fell, and was not found.

V. 20. "Then shall stand up one in his estate, who causeth an exactor to pass over the glory of his kingdom?" thus the words may be rendered. Seleucus Philopater, who succeeded his father, being obliged to pay a large annual tribute to the Romans, performed nothing memorable, except levying money from his subjects for this and other purposes. These exactions tarnished the glory of his kingdom; and within a few days or years, (for he reigned twelve years,) he was slain by Heliodorus, whom he had employed to rob the temple of God at Jerusalem. Thus he was destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle, but by treachery: for Heliodorus hoped to succeed to the throne; as Demetrius the son of Seleucus was a hostage at Rome, and Antiochus his brother was absent from the Syrian court. This project however was disappointed.

V. 21. Antiochus, who succeeded his brother Seleucus, was returning from Rome when he heard of his murder by Heliodorus. "The honour of the kingdom was not given to him;" for Heliodorus intended to seize it for himself, others aimed to give it to the king of Egypt, and Demetrius the son of Seleucus was the proper heir of it: so that no party thought of placing Antiochus on the throne. But "he came in peaceably, and obtained it by "flatteries." He flattered Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and his brother Attalus, and by fair promises engaged them to support him: he flattered the Syrians with a fair show of clemency; and, as some say, by pretending to hold the crown for his nephew till his return from Rome, by which he obtained peaceable possession: and he flattered the Romans, with the assurance of being a faithful and good ally; and thus he came in, to the exclusion of all his rivals. He was also in turn flattered with the title of Epiphanes, or the illustrious; though some more justly called him Epimanes, or the madman. However, the expression of the angel to Daniel, a vile person, best befitted him; for his frantic, indecent, and contemptible behaviour, in many respects, proved him to be all that can be implied in such a title.

V. 22, 23. Antiochus was at first successful in war: for "with the arms of a flood shall they be overflowed "before him;" or, "the arms of the overflow shall be "overflowed before him;" that is, Heliodorus and his other opponents, whose power seemed ready to bear all before it, were speedily borne down by Antiochus, and entirely destroyed. "Yea, also the prince of the covenant." Most expositors understand this of the Jewish high-priest, the prince of God's covenanted people: for as soon as Antiochus was seated on the throne, he expelled Onias from the high-priesthood, and sold it to his younger brother Jason for a large sum of money; and Onias was soon after cruelly murdered by Antiochus's deputy. But after his agreement with Jason he acted deceitfully: for induced by another sum of money, he by force of arms deposed Jason, and advanced Menelaus his brother to that dignity. "For," or rather, "and he shall come up and shall become strong "with a small people." He had come from Rome with few attendants: his power in Syria was at first inconsiderable; yet from small beginnings he became exceedingly strong. Some, however, explain this of Ptolemy Philometor; between whom and Antiochus a league, or covenant of peace, had been ratified: yet afterwards he wrought deceitfully, and at length, when become sufficiently strong, he made war upon Ptolemy.

V. 24-26. Antiochus had greater success both against the Egyptian provinces in Asia, and against that kingdom itself, than any of his predecessors had had: and he also exceeded them in liberality, or rather extravagance; for he scattered among the people, wherever he went, the prey that he had taken from his enemies, the spoil of cities and temples, the riches of his friends, and his own revenues; so that his profusion exceeded that of any of his progenitors. Thus he fixed the people in his interests: and when his authority was established at home, he began to forecast devices against the strong-holds of Ptolemy, that still held out against him; and he was preparing during some years for the war that he meditated. At length with all his power and courage he led a great army against the king of Egypt, who sent his generals with a mighty force to oppose his progress: but Antiochus prevailed, through the fraudulent counsels and treacherous conduct of Ptolemy's partizans. And the next year Antiochus obtained still more decided advantages, and got possession of almost all Egypt. For Ptolemy's ministers and servants helped in different ways to ruin his interests; as some of them betrayed his cause, and others exasperated the people to resist it by their base and abominable practices: and thus Ptolemy's Physcon his brother was set up for king in opposition to him. By these means Antiochus's forces prevailed, and great numbers of Ptolemy's were slain.

with great riches; and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits, and return to his own laud.

29 At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south; but it shall not be as the former, nor as the latter.

V. 27, 28. By what means Ptolemy Philometor came into the hands of Antiochus is not known; he seems, however, to have been his prisoner. Thus they frequently ate at the same table, or met at the same council-board, and pretended to be amicably disposed, and to enter into a treaty; but they were both bent on mischief, and told lies to each other. Antiochus pretended a great regard to Ptolemy's interest, and to secure him against the designs of his brother; and Ptolemy professed to confide in Antiochus, and to deem himself bound to him by the strongest ties; whereas Antiochus only meant to weaken the two brothers by fomenting their discords, till he should be able to seize upon the whole kingdom; and Ptolemy was aiming to effect a reconciliation with his brother, that they might unite in expelling the invader. But this fraud did not fully prosper on either side: Antiochus could not get possession of the whole kingdom; and Ptolemy could not drive him out of it. Antiochus was at length induced to leave Egypt and return to Syria, with immense treasures that he had seized; and his heart was turned against the holy covenant; for the report being spread of his death, it occasioned great rejoicings and some insurrections among the Jews; which so exasperated him, that he resolved to be revenged on the nation. Accordingly he besieged and took Jerusalem, slew forty thousand of its inhabitants, and sold twice that number for slaves; he then polluted the temple with swine's flesh and various defilements; he even entered with violence into the holy of holies; he plundered the sacred treasures; and having succeeded thus far, he returned home to Antioch.

V. 29, 30. After an interval of two years, in the time before appointed of God, Antiochus returned to renew his attempts against Egypt, and finding that the two brothers were amicably providing for their common safety, he made war upon them with great impetuosity and success. However, this expedition terminated in a different manner, from either of the preceding: for the Roman state sent ambassadors to him, at the request of the Ptolemies, commanding him to lay down his arms, and not to molest their allies. Perhaps these ambassadors came in Grecian ships, or the name Chittim signifies the several European countries that border on the Mediterranean sea. They executed their commission in the most peremptory and decisive manner; for one of them made a circle with his cane round Antiochus, and insisted on his answer before he passed out of that circle; being determined to declare war against him, if he hesitated to comply with his demands; and Antiochus, not daring to bring upon himself the whole power of the Romans, who were then free from other wars, was forced to submit. Thus he was checked in his full career of victory, to his extreme vexation; and returning home full of grief and shame, he vented his indignation against the Jews, the covenant-people of God: for he detached Apollonius with an army of twenty-two thousand men, who, coming to Jerusalem, slew great multitudes, plundered the city, set fire to it in several places, and pulled down the houses. Then they builded up a strong eminence in the city of David, a strong fortress, which might command the temple; and issuing from thence, they fell on those that came to worship, and shed innocent blood on every side of the sanctuary, and defiled it; so that the temple was deserted, and the whole service omitted; the city was forsaken of the natives, and became an habitation for strangers. "So he did" at the time; and after his return to Antioch he published a decree, which obliged all persons under pain of death to conform to the religion of the Greeks: and so the Jewish law was abrogated, and the heathen worship was set up in its stead, and the temple itself was consecrated to Jupiter Olympius. In transacting these matters, "he had intelligence with them that forsook the holy covenant," that is, with Menelaus, and other apostate Jews of his party. (Bp. Newton.) Indeed, the distresses of the Jews in those days arose principally from the machinations of their countrymen, who joined the enemies of their nation and religion. "There is not so complete and regular a series of these kings, nor so concise and comprehensive an account of their affairs, to be found in any author of those times." "So that it is necessary to have recourse to several authors, Greek and Roman, Jewish and Christian, to collect something from one, and something from another, to explain and illustrate the great variety of particulars contained in this prophecy." "No one could thus declare the times and seasons, but he who hath them in his own power." (Acts i. 7.) (Bp. Newton.)

V. 31. Thus far the prophecy is clear, and the interpretation satisfactory: but the subsequent part is very difficult, and commentators have differed exceedingly about it. Some have explained the whole of Antiochus Epiphanes; some have made him a type of Antichrist; and others extend some parts of it to the subsequent kings of Syria: nay, some expositors decline giving any interpretation of these predictions; except as they stop to show us how impossible it is to apply many things in it to Antiochus. But though all that follows in this vision cannot be explained of the short-lived exploits of this "vile person," yet a similarity of character and conduct, betwixt him and future oppressors of God's people, might give occasion to the inspired writer, &c. to the angel, to glide from one to the other by an almost imperceptible transition. As Antiochus had the power of the sword on his part, his captains seized on and polluted the sanctuary, which had been strongly fortified, and which was itself the defence of the people; and they entirely suppressed the stated worship, and placed a base idol in the temple of God, which was an abomination that desolated the city and sanctuary, by driving thence all pious Jews: they also builded idol-altars in all the cities of Judah. This therefore may apply to Antiochus. But very eminent expositors suppose, that the transition before-mentioned begins here to take place: and that, as it must shortly be admitted, it cannot be better introduced, than here. 'In the same year that Antiochus, by the command of the Romans, retired out of Egypt, and set up the worship of the Greeks in Judea, the Romans conquered the kingdom of Macedon, the fundamental kingdom of the empire of the Greeks, and reduced it into a Roman province; and thereby began to put an end to the reign of Daniel's third beast. This is thus expressed by Daniel: "And after him arms," (that is the Romans,) "shall stand up." Arms are every where in this prophecy put for the military power of a kingdom; and they stand up, when they conquer and grow powerful. Hitherto Daniel described the actions of the kings of the north and the south: but upon the conquest of Macedon by the Romans, he left off describing the actions of the Greeks, and began to describe those of the Romans in Greece.' (Sir Is. Newton.) 'In support of this interpretation, it may be further added, that the Jews themselves, as Jerome informs us, understood this passage neither of Antiochus Epiphanes, nor of Antichrist, but of the Romans; of whom it was said above, that "the ships of Chittim shall come," &c. After some time, says the prophet, out of the Romans themselves, who came to assist Ptolemy, and menaced Antiochus, there shall arise the emperor Vespasian; there shall arise his arms and seed, his son Titus with an army, and they shall pollute the sanctuary, and take away the daily sacrifice, and deliver the temple to eternal desolation.' (H. Newton.) 'We must know, that after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, the third kingdom comes no more into the holy reckoning; none of the Greek kings after him being at all prophesied of. The reason of this is, because, during the reign of Antiochus, Macedonia, (whence that kingdom sprang; with all the rest of Greece, came under the Roman obedience. From thence therefore the Holy Ghost begins the rise of the fourth kingdom, yea, the Roman historians themselves mark out that time for the rise of their empire.' (Mede.) 'Our Saviour himself, making use of the same phrase, the abomination of desolation, in his prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, may convince us, that this part of the prophecy refers to that event?' (H. Newton.) The emphatical manner in which our Lord quotes this prophecy of Daniel, (Marg. Ref.) greatly confirms this argument. Indeed, the concluding verse of the ninth chapter contains nearly the same language, in an express prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. There can remain no doubt with any one, who carefully compares the concluding part of this chapter and the next chapter with the other scriptures; and attentively examines the import of the words employed; and attentively considers the records of the history; that the fourth kingdom, even that of the Romans, is predicted. First Rome Pagan, then Rome Christian, and then Rome Antichristian, must be intended; whether the transition be made at this verse, or not till the thirty-sixth: for no other power, that has hitherto appeared on earth, at all answers to the description here given, or has had dominion during so long a term of time, as the angel plainly marks out. The persecutions and profanations of the temple, by Antiochus Epiphanes, began about one hundred and sixty-eight years before the Christian Era: he died not more than four years afterwards: the Romans soon began to disturb the Jews: at length Pompey, about sixty-three years before the Christian Era, took Jerusalem, and entered into the holy of holies. He, however, in other respects, neither plundered nor profaned the temple. But from that time, Jerusalem was dependent on the Romans, and subject to those whom they made kings or governors, till the destruction of the city and temple by Titus: and in the year of our Lord one hundred and thirty-two, the emperor Adrian caused a temple to be erected to Jupiter Capitolinus, on the very spot where the temple of God before stood, and banished the Jews from Jerusalem and its neighbourhood. Thus "the abomination that maketh desolate," was effectually placed in "the sanctuary of strength," to pollute it; and "the daily sacrifice was taken away." Yet these events seem also to have been, in some degree, figures of the corruptions introduced into the Christian Church, by the idolatries of Antichristian Rome. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 32, 33. Antiochus doubtless corrupted many of the Jews to do wickedly, by his flattering promises and rewards: and the remnant that knew, trusted, and loved their God, were greatly strengthened, and did wonders, both in supporting his cruel tortures, and resisting his usurped and abused authority: but it cannot so well be said, that they instructed many, or made numerous converts to their religion. And though they endured severe things, yet it was not for many days; three years and a half being a very short time in the language of prophecy. But the Romans not only destroyed Jerusalem, and took away the daily sacrifice; but during their dominion they both crucified Christ, persecuted his followers, and also set themselves to extirpate Christianity: and their magistrates used
